Acting under these recommendations, the general manager of the course, J. Z. Tyler, of Cleveland, with the committee co-operating with him, have prepared and issued the following handbooks. Those designed for the first-year readers are: "A Guide to Bible Study," by J. W. McGarvey; "Concerning the Disciples," by B. B. Tyler, and "Handbook of Missions," by A. McLean. For second-year readers the handbooks published are: "Life and Teachings of Jesus," by H. L. Willett; "Sketches of our Pioneers," by F. D. Power, and "Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples," by W. J. Lhamon. The third and last series of books are: "Prophets of Israel," by H. L. Willett; "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples," by F. D. Power; and "Heroes of Modern Missions," by W. J. Lhamon. Bros. Willett, Lhamon and Power are the directors, respectively, of the three lines of study, namely, Bible study, mission study and the study of our own movement. Our readers are familiar with the articles which these directors have been writing in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for a number of years on these different lines of study.

Aside from the fact that these courses of study have been recommended by our National Convention, we do not know where else our churches could find courses of study and reading so well adapted to their particular needs as those mentioned. The men who have prepared these books and the directors who are shaping these courses of study give assurance of thorough work, wisely directed. These two considerations —the fact that these courses of study are recommended and are being used quite generally among our churches, and their special adaptation to the needs of our young people, and our older members, too, as for that matter—are quite sufficient, it seems to us, to cause their adoption at once in every Christian Endeavor Society among us.

This matter, as it seems to us, is of quite sufficient importance to justify pastors of our churches in giving it their personal attention, in calling attention to it from the pulpit, and in seeing to it that reading circles are formed in every church. Unless preaching from the pulpit be supplemented by further educational efforts our young people will grow up without any adequate knowledge of the Scriptures, of our own reformatory movement, and of the missionary activities of the world. For this reason we urge upon our preachers and church officials the importance of their giving this matter their immediate personal attention.

For full particulars regarding these reading courses, which may be begun at any time, we refer our readers and all who are interested to J. Z. Tyler, 798 Republic St., Cleveland, who also will furnish the handbooks above mentioned for the reading courses.

LIFE AND THE SUPERNATURAL.

All life is mysterious. It is the standing miracle of the world. No physician can direct it, no philosopher can define it, no scientific experiment can reveal its essence. It is so mystic and subtle as to elude the grasp of all human instruments, of comprehension and definition. It is everywhere in the organic world. We can see its effects, we can feel it, we can detect its presence, and appreciate the signs of its absence. It pervades every fibre of consciousness and thrills the universe with its power. Yet, we are not able to tell what it is. It is curious that that alone which enables us to define cannot be defined; that that which knows cannot be known; that life uncovers the mysteries of the universe, but cannot uncover itself. We can understand the conditions and see the manifestations of life, and that is enough for all practical purposes. Causation and the essence of things we are given to know but little of in this world. Ultimate facts and moral disclosures that come within the range of our vision, and the communication of such vital knowledge as we need in the formation of character and the development of manhood have been given to us in abundance, but there is a great deal in heaven and earth that we have not dreamed of in our philosophy, and which Christianity itself has not revealed, reserved, no doubt, for the revelation of the future life.

There is, however, a fundamental statement that may be confidently made, viz., that all life originates in God and emerges into being through the gate of the supernatural. The Bible affirms this proposition, and all the facts in hand confirm the truth of the biblical statement. It is the essence of stupidity and a melancholy exhibition of mental weakness to affirm that things made themselves, or came by chance, or that life in any form is self-originated. Nothing could be more unphilosophic than the insidious attempt of modern scientists, self-styled and so-called, to eliminate the suppernatural from the Bible and from the universe by trying to account for the origin of life on natural and physical grounds. We are acquainted with the scientific theory of development, ascribed to Darwin, and sometimes called by his name, which seeks to trace the higher forms of life, including man, back to a primordial or primitive germ, a potentially animated atom, from which, under the laws of matter and force, they were gradually evolved, through a long succession of ages that culminated in the present order of the world. This theory of science has been frequently employed in the unworthy enterprise of getting rid of the miraculous in creation and in history. The evolutionary hypothesis, however, if true, does not affect the claim for the validity of the supernatural. If man is the last link in a long chain of developments and variations, we may pertinently inquire, Who made the first link and gave it the power to forge the others? If man stands at the summit of the creative pyramid which has grown up by an evolutionary process, who, we may ask, or what, made the base and gave it the start—who laid the foundation, and made the material its own builder? If it is said that civilized man was developed from the savage, and the savage from the orang-outang, and the orang-outang from the ape, and the ape from something lower than himself in the scale of creation, and that from something still farther down the line, and so on to the beginning, it may be asked, Where did the first something come from, from which all the other somethings were developed? If you run backwards along this ascending series you will after awhile reach the beginning—that wonderful germ from which all life has been evolved. Who made that? The problem of the supernatural is not solved; it is only transferred. It has yet to be shown that it takes any less creative power to make an atom than it does to make a world.

If you begin with a germ of life infinitesimally small, you need a God and a miracle to create that, and you are as much bound to admit his agency as if you acknowledged the whole history of creation according to the first chapter of Genesis. So, if these scientific speculations were true they do not affect the question of the supernatural in its relation to the origin of life. A miracle must have occurred somewhere. The only difference is that a scientific hypothesis has it expended in the production of a monad and the Bible in the production of a man. If the Mosaic history were overthrown and a scientific cosmogony substituted, the miraculous would not be destroyed, but only transferred—removed a little farther back.

The difficulty suggested in reference to the origin of life without a miracle was so keenly felt by a skeptical astronomer that he undertook to transfer it to another world. He conjectured, as in a high degree probable, that sometime in the remote past an old planet was broken up by internal convulsions and the fragments sent flying through space in all directions. One of these fragments after blazing and wandering through space for millions of years found its way to our little earth and deposited there its first germ of life. From this all the evolutionary progeny are supposed to have sprung. Think of a tiny, delicate germ surviving the fiery convulsion and dissolution of a world, the shock and crash of matter that must have destroyed every vestige of life—and not only so, but think of this being preserved in the inconceivable cold of airless space for millions of years, and then talk of absurdity and credulity! All this to get rid of the Bible account of the creation of life by the power of God! But this, like the theory of evolution on which it is based, leaves the question of the origin of life where it found it. If this wild supposition were even possible it only lengthens the chain of development far enough to locate its beginning in another world, and even then it has a beginning, and we might ask who made that old planet that was so unlucky as to break to pieces? And who made that wonderful germ and miraculously preserved it in its long, cold ride on the back of that fragment of said planet till it reached our globe? And who made our globe with its multiplied conditions responsive to life, on which the fragment and the germ were deposited? So, when we follow these men through all the labyrinths of speculation and philosophy and unscientific theorizing we return to our statement with confidence doubly reassured, that all life, physical, intellectual and moral, originates in God as its uncreated source, and emerges into being through the gate of the supernatural.

Hour of Prayer.

THE CROWNED YEAR.

(Psa. 65:9-13; 100:1-5.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, November 29th.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: God's bountiful provision for man's material and spiritual needs calls for our gratitude and thanksgiving.

Let us quote here this beautiful picture which the psalmist draws of God's providence through nature:

"Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it,
Thou greatly enrichest it;
The river of God is full of water;
Thou providest them grain
When thou hast so prepared the earth.
Thou waterest her furrows abundantly;
Thou settlest the ridges thereof;
Thou makest it soft with showers;
Thou blessest the springing thereof.
Thou crownest the year with thy goodness,
And thy paths drop fatness.
They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness,
And the hills are girded with joy.
The pastures are clothed with flocks;
The valleys also are covered with grain;
They shout for joy, they also sing."

The man who wrote those lines had a poet's eye and a poet's heart. He saw the visible manifestation of God in nature, and allowed no mere phrase, such as "natural law," to shut out God from his world. It was God that visited the earth with rain and caused the growth of vegetation and multiplied the flocks of the pasture. Therefore, to him praise and thanksgiving should be given. If Palestine, with its limited range of territory, of climate and products, could call forth expressions of gratitude for the goodness of God from the devout hearts of ancient Israel, how much more should this widely extended land of ours, with its great diversity of soil, of products, of mines, awaken a sense of gratitude among those whose privilege it is to be citizens of this great country.

This has, indeed, been a prosperous year. The crops have been bountiful, so that the barns of many of the great states of the Union are running over with their gathered treasures. Prices also have been better than in former years, and prosperity smiles upon our beloved country. Our nation is at peace with all the nations of the earth, and with all its peoples, except a portion of the Philippine population, and there is an encouraging prospect that this unfortunate conflict will soon be ended, and that these misguided people will come to a better understanding of the spirit and aim of this nation toward them. For these material blessings and comforts, so bountifully bestowed by the hand of Providence, let us not fail to be devoutly thankful.

The other psalm of the lesson summons us to joyful thanksgiving unto God on still higher grounds. Here it is our relationship to God which the psalmist gives as the ground of thanksgiving:

"It is He that hath made us, and we are His;
We are His people, and the sheep of His pasture."

What greater reason for thankfulness than this? God is our Creator. We belong to Him. How we should rejoice in this ownership! Not only are we "His people," but "the sheep of His pasture." He is our Shepherd. He will lead us into green pastures and beside the still waters. He will care for us as the good shepherd careth for his flock. He has so cared for us in the past. When we were lost and wandering upon the dark mountains of sin He sought us and gently brought us back to the fold. How can we ever thank Him sufficiently for His tender care? Surely, the remembrance of all His goodness toward us will make it a delight to—

"Enter into His gates with thanksgiving,
And into His courts with praise"

In view, then, of God's manifold blessings to us, through nature and through grace, ministering to our bodily and to our spiritual needs, we ought to render heartfelt gratitude to Him who hath crowned the year with His loving kindness and with His tender mercies.

PRAYER.

O Thou who art the great and bountiful Giver of every blessing, to Thee we lift up grateful hearts for every good and perfect gift which has blessed our lives. We thank Thee for abundant harvests, sufficient to satisfy the hunger of all Thy creatures, and we thank Thee for those spiritual benefits by which Thou hast ministered to our higher nature. Help us, we beseech Thee, to be grateful for all Thy loving kindness, and to manifest our gratitude by living such lives as Thou wouldst have us live, and by doing the work faithfully which Thou hast given us to do. For Christ's sake. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

We have never failed to be impressed with those stately words in the introduction of Handel's "Messiah," "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem." It touches one's heart to know that God wishes His people to be comforted. He knows their sorrows, their burdens, their heartaches, and He would comfort them, even as a mother comforteth her child. We are constantly reminded of the fact that there is a great deal more need of comfort than of scolding and fault-finding. Most people need encouragement more than criticism. They need to be shown the way, as Brother Aylsworth pointed out in that excellent article of his last week, which we trust no one of our readers failed to read. And how many are the hearts—far more than we even suspect—that need comfort! This has been called to our mind by a letter just received from a sister in a distant state. Her burden of sorrow is one which only God can remove. But any one who knows God as Father, and who has come into loving touch with Him, can easily minister the very divine comfort which this burdened heart needs. It is a great Christian privilege to be able to minister comfort to troubled hearts and to show them the loving character of God. Preachers of the gospel, editors of religious papers and those who write for them have a great opportunity in this way to reach many troubled and anxious souls with a message of comfort. What higher office can one aspire to, in this world, than to be a bearer of God's tender love and sympathy to the weary and heavy-laden ones of earth?

If we might be permitted to whisper a word to that large corps of writers whose contributions are to fill the columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the coming year, we would say to them, Be careful what you write. Have a mind to the needs of those for whom you write. Have you doubts and fears and anxieties? The poor, sin-burdened world has enough of these. Have you a strong, unwavering faith that opens up to you spiritual realities and unveils to you the heart of the loving Father? Have you a hope that sings its song of cheer through all the night of darkness, and rejoices in the prospect of better days to come? Have you a love that triumphs over all political or religious lines, over all human prejudices and embraces the whole world? Bring on your messages of faith and hope and love, and they will awaken a response in thousands of weary hearts and cause flowers to bloom again where are only barrenness and desolation. It is necesary, occasionally, of course, to point out the evils that exist in the world. But men can be persuaded out of evil and loved out of evil, but they cannot be hated or driven out of evil.

A noted revivalist, at the close of a great meeting, is reported to have said: "The great trouble with all of us is, we do not know God." How true this is! We make Him small and partial and often even vindictive, like ourselves, not knowing that—

"There's a wideness in God's mercy
Like the wideness of the sea."

We make Him a tyrant, an Oriental monarch, and forget that He is a loving Father, dealing with us as with children. That boy of ours that has gone out from our view into the unseen world—why are we anxious about him? You say he was not a member of the church. Do you love him in spite of that fact? Is God's love for one of His little ones less than yours? Will not infinite love do more for our children who go out from us than we could possibly do for them? Can we not trust Him whose heart was broken on Calvary for the world's sin? Let us try to know God better. We can do this in no way so well as by studying Christ. He came to show us the Father. How did Christ feel and act toward men, even sinful men, when He was here? What was his teaching concerning the prodigal son? Let us trust God, and the more we know Him the more inclined we shall be to trust Him. O that we might all come to know Him better! Then we should love Him more and hate sin more.

Coming back to the thought of what we should write the coming year, may we not hope that every article sent will be consecrated by prayer? Let us seek to awaken the careless, to strengthen the weak, to instruct the untaught, to support the faltering, to encourage the disheartened and to comfort those who are in trouble. Let us fill the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST with the sunshine of Christ's love and make it a message of good cheer to all who are cast down in spirit or who are weary with the struggle of life. Let us study to know God better, and to better interpret His character and will to men, that they may be constrained to love Him. He has been misunderstood, misrepresented and even slandered by those who have professed to love Him. It will be a blessed thing if during the coming year we shall come to a better knowledge of God and of His will, and can teach others the same. So shall we fulfill the divine mandate, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people!"

Questions and Answers.

Our church has about decided to abandon the study of the International Sunday-school Lessons in our Sunday-school. What do you advise in the matter?

Jay E. Adams.

San Antonio, Tex.

We would strongly advise the church at San Antonio, and all other churches and schools, to stand faithfully by the International Sunday-school Lessons. Beginning with January 1, these lessons take up the life of Christ, chronologically, as given in the four Gospels, and study it for eighteen months, from His birth in Bethlehem on down to His ascension, and following Him into the Acts and in Revelation until his appearance to John in the Isle of Patmos. This is a glorious outline of study and cannot be improved upon anywhere by any system of Bible study. There is no other series of lessons that lays any claim to being uniform lessons. If the religious world is to keep step, as heretofore, in the study of the Scriptures, it must do so through the International Sunday-school Lessons. These are, no doubt, susceptible of improvement, and will be improved just as the great body of Christian sentiment shall demand it. They are already improved, and the series of lessons for the next eighteen months is evidence that the International Committee is seeking to conform its plans of Bible study to the wishes of the people. It would be a great mistake, in our judgment, for any school to break away from these lessons, especially just now, when we are entering upon such a promising course of study.

A minister who had been called to the pastorate of a church for one year, at a stipulated salary, and who had accepted the work and continued four months, receiving the salary agreed upon, applied during this time for another pastorate without consulting the church board, and received the call at a larger salary and accepted it. He then offered his resignation, to take effect in thirty days, this being the first intimation the board or congregation had of his desire to make a change. On his refusal to withdraw his acceptance of the second call, and continue with the church, his resignation was accepted, to take effect at once. What is your view of the minister's course and of the action of the board? H.

The facts being as given in the above statement, we should say the preacher's course was wholly unjustified, and that the church did exactly right in dispensing with his services at once on finding him intent upon breaking his contract. There are some preachers who need to learn that congregations have some rights which they are bound to respect, just as there are some churches which need to be taught that preachers have some rights which they are bound to respect. A preacher is not privileged to break a contract any more than any other man. If the word contract seems too cold a term to use in such a connection, then we would say a preacher has no right to violate any agreement into which he has entered with a congregation to serve it for a given time. One of the weak sides of some preachers' character is their failure to recognize the binding character of a business contract. This results, probably, from the fact that they have not been drilled in the ethics of business. Out of this tendency comes the too frequent complaint that preachers do not meet their financial obligations. This is charitably attributed to small salaries, irregularly paid, and no doubt this consideration shoud have due weight; but we fear that behind this fact there is lack of a high ethical standard as relates to the business side of their lives. Preachers cannot be too much on their guard against this defect.

What denomination or church does the Watch Tower Bible Tract Society, of Allegheny, Pa., represent? The same people also publish the Millennial Dawn.

R. R. Hamlin.

We learn through W. J. Lhamon, pastor of the church at Allegheny, Pa., that the people publishing the Millennial Dawn and the Watch Tower Bible Tract Society of that city, do not claim to be Adventists, but to be undenominational. They are premillennarians, however, and this view of things is advocated in the Millennial Dawn. Bro. Lhamon thinks that the doctrinal position of Mr. Russell, who is the leader of the movement, fairly ranks him with the Adventists.

"IN HIS STEPS."—II.
A Lesson of the Hour.

N. J. AYLSWORTH.

The lesson of the experiment described in Mr. Sheldon's book has another aspect. Henry Maxwell had preached for years on the duties of the Christian life. He had made eloquent appeals for greater faithfulness in Christian living; but on that particular Sunday morning he said in a plain way, "Let us do this PARTICULAR thing NOW." He descended from the abstract to the concrete—from general and indefinite exhortations to a definite thing. He did not say, "Let us follow the Master in general and throughout our lives," but, "Let us do this one thing for one year." The moment he said this his people knew that he meant it. The heart escapes through generalities, but this was definite. This faced duty squarely. When Henry Maxwell had been uttering his generalities, he had not expected his people to do what he taught. Had they done so, he would have been astounded. From his most moving sermons he expected nothing more than that a wave of spiritual emotion would pass over his people, spend itself in fruitless aspiration and then disappear. That his truth would be laid to heart, so as to revolutionize all their business and social relations, he did not even dream. Conventionality has handicapped every sermon with this thought: It does not mean what it says. The people believe this, and the preacher feels compelled to believe it. Face the situation squarely yourself and then be definite, and your words shall tear like a plowshare through the conventionality that binds your people, and you will find them ready to walk with you in the Master's steps, even in most difficult ways. Not once, but many times, have persons come to the writer and said: "Such an one has treated me badly; you teach us that we should not resent wrong. I want to do right about this. How would you think it best to deal with it?" I have said: "It is plain that you have been badly treated, and I think I would do this way," naming the course. I have seen them go away and do things that were simply sublime, and have known that they were grand enough to enjoy it. It is said to be "more blessed to give than to receive," and many have been noble enough to find it so; but what is it to forgive—to bless an enemy? He who rises to this grandeur has been for a moment divine. There is no bliss like the tall greatness of love. Can he who has been in this Mount of Transfiguration ever hate again? There is a fascination about the heroism of love that siezes on men and holds them in the grip of a heavenly temptation. Sublime temptation! Holy danger! Blessed is he that encounters it!

It was claimed by F. W. Robertson that the "milk of the Word" is not the simpler doctrines, but the first simple duties of the Christian life, and that these should be taught till they are mastered in practice. The writer has tried this experiment. He has preached on one subject at the morning service for many months; nay, he has circled round it for a year at a time. Did the people grow tired? There were persons all over the house taking notes; they did it habitually; they did it for years. No more fruitful or interesting preaching was ever done by him than this. He who would expound one of the great Christian virtues and work it into practice, will have a year's work before him. It is a mine in which he may delve with ever new surprise. Go with your people; find out their difficulties; discover where they are failing, and sermons will troop upon you fresh from the workshop of human hearts; and you will be ever coming upon quiet heroisms among your people that will thrill you and give wings to your speech.

Often the speaking part of the prayer-meeting has been turned into a conversation meeting, bringing in the experiences from this battlefield of some fundamental virtue. "Were they interesting?" you ask. What meetings could be more so?

Ministers seek an endless variety of themes for the sake of maintaining an interest. The sermon of one Sunday is far removed from that of the week before, and is thought the better for this lack of connection. This is to misconceive the whole situation. Interest? Be a Moses to your people. Start yourself, and say, "Come; we will do this one thing now." Open the Red Sea of difficulties before them; find the manna in the wilderness for them; smite the rock till the waters gush forth that meet their need, and you shall not lack for interest. When the people of Israel stood there perishing with thirst, it was no time to build Solomon's temple.

Speak to your people as though you meant it. Give them some definite Christian task. Do not invert the ladder of Christian virtues. Give them a lesson from God; then say, We will do this now, to-day, this week, this month. Do not, then, leave your sermon to take care of itself, like ostrichs' eggs in the sand, but follow it and see what becomes of it. Follow with your eye each member in his effort, or no effort. Find out his difficulties and study them. The pastor must be a statesman. Do not belabor your people, or or preach as one who beats the air. Generalities will not help them. See your object before you strike. Be a spiritual "workman that needeth not to be ashamed." Find out the difficulties and put them right in the best way—in a thousand different ways according to the need. Do not follow others blindly. No general method will fit your particular case. You cannot run your church by machinery; or, if you do, it will be a mechanical movement without spirit or life. You must be an inventor, a leader, a captain, a shepherd of souls.

Believe in your people. They are noble; there are heroes in your church. Call them to hardship and they are ready. Ask them to suffer, and they are beside you with holy tears. Ask them to tread rough ways with bleeding feet, and they gather about you. There is no appeal that will move men like the call to suffer. There are men in your church that want to be hurt for Christ. Carlyle calls this sublime passion the "worship of sorrow," the spirit which Christ brought to the world. Our navy is full of Hobsons; our churches are full of heroic men and women. We need but find the Merrimacs. Christ said, "My sheep hear my voice and follow me." That voice was purity, righteousness, suffering. Stand and sound the note and—listen. Your pews will be full of echoes.

IS WAR JUSTIFIABLE BETWEEN CHRISTIAN NATIONS?*

DR. B. A. HINSDALE.

I have consented to speak on this subject with some reluctance; for while the subject is hackneyed, it is by no means free from difficulties. Let us begin at the beginning.

By a Christian nation we understaad a nation that is converted to Christ; a nation that has been molded by his teaching and is inspired by his spirit. This means that the people of the nation, or a controlling majority of them, are Christians, disciples, followers of Christ. There is a philosophy now current that recognizes a corporate character and responsibility that are in a measure independent of the individuals making up the corporation, such as a state or nation. But this is not a Christian philosophy; it is not a sound philosophy. The whole is made up of units which, however, greatly modify one another. Accordingly, national responsibility is a union of individual responsibilities. If a state deserves praise, it is because the citizens have done well; and if it should be blamed, it is because they have done ill.

What, then, is the rule between individual Christians? It is laid down by the Master in the well-known passage of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:38-45):

> Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth:
> But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.
> And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.
> And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.
> Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.
> Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy.
> But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you.
> That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven, for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and unjust.

The Christian world has never been agreed as to the meaning of this teaching. Some Christians have taken it literally, and have accordingly placed themselves avowedly on the nonresistant platform. The Quakers may be mentioned as an example. But the vast majority of Christians have recognized in the passage the paradoxical element that is so abundant in the Bible literatures, and so have refused to place upon it a rigid interpretation. "We must be guided by the spirit of the passage," they say. "Christians should be forbearing, long-suffering, merciful, not visiting retributive justice upon men; they must not lay justice to the line, nor righteousness to the plummet. They must be like the Author of their religion." As a well-known commentator has said: "Of course, these expressions, in their paradoxical form, must not be taken literally. The fundamental idea of the passage is that Christian love must make us willing to bear twice as much as the world in its injustice could demand."

This view of the language is confirmed by an appeal to nature and to experience. The passage, if literally applied in practice, would apparently lead to the disorganization of society. It is an impossible interpretation.

If we may assume that the consensus of Christian interpretation is a safe guide in such a case, we may take the foregoing as the Christian teaching concerning the relations of Christian brethren.

But while we refuse to be literally bound by Christ's paradoxes, we must not hastily infer that they mean little. They mean rather a vast deal. They set up a very high standard of life; they are a distinct anticipation of the time when men shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks; when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, and neither shall they learn war any more.

Passing from individual Christians to Christian nations, we have only to apply the gospel teaching. The same rule applies to individuals and to the corporation that they comprise. The gospel does not lay down one rule for the Christian citizen and another for the Christian state. In practice it is exceedingly difficult to follow the gospel teaching, owing to the mixed and confused state in which we find the world. It is difficult when individuals only are involved, and much more difficult when states are involved. Cases arise that trouble us in practical application, but there is no mistaking the principle. The ancient teaching is still true; it is righteousness that exalteth the nation.

Is war, then, justifiable, between Christian nations? Yes, or no; as you look at the question. One Christian nation may resist the wanton attack of another, if there is no other resort, but one Christian nation has no right to make a wanton attack upon an other. All wars of aggression are contrary to the gospel. It may be, and it often is, practically difficult to distinguish aggressive wars from non-aggressive wars, since wars often present a mixture of elements; but it is something to maintain the principle, to hold up the ideal. Indeed, there is no other time when it is so important to maintain the principle, as when it is difficult to apply it; no other time when it is so necessary to lift up an ideal, as when men are falling away from it.

No careful reader of the Bible can have failed to observe how much it has to say about peace. It is the subject of some of the noblest passages. The greatest of the Old Testament seers looked forward to a reign of peace as the golden age of the world. The teaching of Christ and the apostles lead toward the same goal. The world has not yet reached it; far from it. Still, much has been done to reduce the amount of fighting and bloodshed, as well as to mitigate the horrors of war, but the reign of peace is still in the future. But we should never swerve in our devotion to the ideal, or distrust the prophecy. Although the world be filled with wars and rumors of wars, let the poets still sing of the time when—

> "the war drum throbs no longer
> And the battle flags are furled in the parliament of man,
> The federation of the world."

In particular, I should say, the growing faith that, as far as possible, war should be averted by means of arbitration is in distinct accord with the spirit of Christian teaching,

The present is a time to remember the Christian teaching in respect to war. The period is an imperial one. The days are days of expansion. We hear much of the duty of Christian nations to carry the blessings of their civilization to those that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death. In our own country the press teems and the pulpit resounds with exhortations to Christian men, not only to follow the flag with the gospel, but to carry the flag as a forerunner of the gospel. Trade and Christianity seem strangely mixed in some minds, while the bolder spirits among us, as in Europe, are saying that too much peace brings decay of manly character, and that we need frequent or occasional wars as a moral discipline and tonic. I shall not discuss these questions, but Christian men should have a care. Christ rebuked his disciples who would call down fire from heaven to consume their enemies. He did not preach the gunboat gospel. Of all religions in the world, Christianity is the last one to be propagated by force. The very word "peace" is made the symbol of the life of the Christian soul.

There is reason to fear that the idea of might is encroaching upon the idea of right. If this is so, it is a most serious matter. The substitution of might for right as a criterion of conduct may well be called the final and absolute apostasy of a spiritual being. Even the poet of imperialism, startled apparently by the very fierceness of the flame that he has done so much to feed, has called upon his countrymen not to follow—

*Remarks made at the business men's meeting at the Congregational Church, Ann Arbor, November 5, 1899.

"The heathen heart that puts her trust
In reeking tube and iron shaird."

Remember that—

"Still stands thine ancient sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart."

Especially should Christians remember that the gospel is not diffused by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith Lord of Hosts.

ACTUAL AND FORMAL REMISSION OF SINS.

A. B. JONES.

It is a fact, that there is a difference between sinning against a person and sinning against a government—that I may sin against the President of the United States, personally, without infracting any of the laws of my country; and that I may violate the laws of the United States without personal offence to the President.

It is a fact, that there is a difference between the forgiveness which the President extends to me for a personal wrong done him, and the pardon which he extends to me for violations against the laws of the government. While the former involves purely personal feelings and is a personal favor, the latter involves only official feelings and is an official favor.

It is a fact, that in the family administration these two elements, the personal and the governmental, are blended and united; that they cannot exist separately and independently. In the very nature of things, the father cannot feel and act toward the child without regard both to the filial relation and to the family government. And, when the child stands before the father, in penitence and tears, over his own misdeeds, the father's heart melts with tender compassion and actual forgiveness; and any condition the father may assign, in extending forgiveness to his child, is not to create sympathy, or a disposition to forgive in the parental heart, but is prescribed solely in the interest of the child and of family government.

It is a fact, that God is presented to us in the Scriptures as a father. He is represented as loving his children, and seeking their welfare, with even more solicitude than we can feel toward our children. Reason says, if God is immaculate in his nature, then he can feel and love and forgive with more grace than is possible to man. And the Holy Scriptures teach the same lesson. "If you, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him." "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." But this double relation, the personal and the governmental, exists in a higher degree in the divine nature than in human nature, for the reason that his children are more numerous, and their conditions more diversified. Hence the necessity laid upon God to forgive and to govern wisely, and with reference to the good of the individual and the whole family, is greater than it can be in our family governments. While, in his infinite, parental nature, he, knowing the hearts of men and seeing the contrite sinner, the penitent believer is in the right moral condition to receive it, actually grants his personal, fatherly forgiveness; yet, for the sinner's own good and for the good of others, it is formally extended through baptism. Baptism is on ordinance of the church, of God's government. It is the formal, initiatory rite; and intended, not to influence God, but to influence men. This distinction between actual and formal remission of sins is, therefore, reasonable and philosophical.

It is a fact, that this distinction is clearly set forth in the teachings of Jesus Christ our Lord. His supreme effort, as a teacher, was to get behind mere forms in religion, and to secure those moral conditions that could alone give value to external ordinances. The burden of his life was to inculcate high spiritual ideas; to lead men away from the mere "tithing of mint, anise and cummin while they neglected the weightier matters of the law, faith, justice, love and mercy." Faith in God, trust in Christ, with all the moral and spiritual factors and forces naturally and spontaneously associated with them, was the lesson of the Master's life. "Eat of the bread of life and never die." "Drink of the water of life and never thirst again."

When the Savior says, "He that believeth on the Son of God is not condemned," he says that man is forgiven. A man is either condemned or not condemned, forgiven or not forgiven. Again, the great teacher says, "He that believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." If he "is passed from death unto life," if he "has everlasting life," then he is forgiven. But these things are declared to be true as a consequence of faith in God and his Son. These declarations of Christ teach that there is forgiveness, in some sense, regardless of baptism. But the Savior says, "Except a man be born of water," baptized, he can not enter into the kingdom of heaven—can not be forgiven.

Now, here, I understand the Savior to teach that forgiveness of sins, in some sense, is a consequence of baptism.

Evidently the remission of sins in these two cases cannot be in the same sense. The former contemplates the moral conditions growing out of the personal relations of the Heavenly Father and his erring children, and means actual, personal forgiveness; while the latter has reference to the divine government as a means of influencing and saving men, to an act of legal obedience, and means formal forgiveness.

It is a fact, that this distinction appears in the teachings of the apostles.

Peter, in opening the kingdom to the Gentiles, announces a great fundamental principle thus: "To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth on him shall receive remission of sins" (Acts 10:43). And Paul, in preaching to the Jews in their synagogue at Antioch, announces the same truth: "Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins, and by him all that believe are justified from all things, from which you could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts 13:38).

And Paul's great argument in his epistle to the Romans and Galatians, was a strong, continuous, labored effort to establish the doctrine that "faith is accounted to a man for justification" (Rom. 4:9; Gal. 3:6). He rings the changes on this so often, and in so many ways, that it seems difficult to misunderstand him. Notwithstanding all these facts, Peter says, "Be baptized for the remission of sins," and Paul says, we are "baptized into Jesus Christ," which is, I think, equivalent to being "baptized into remission of sins." Now, when these inspired men teach that the remission of sins is consequent upon faith in Christ, and yet teach that it is consequent upon baptism, there is no way yet discovered by the exegetical scholarship of the world to reconcile these declarations, except upon ground that the former refers to actual, personal forgiveness of the Father, and the latter to formal, governmental remission.

It is a fact, that, in the New Testament, the grace of forgiveness is made a sequence to a moral change wrought in the soul by the gospel of Christ. This moral change is represented by different terms, at different times; but, when these terms appear alone, they imply the others, because they are cognate moral forces, necessarily involving each other.

"Repent therefore and turn again that your sins may be blotted out" (Acts 3:19).

"With the heart man believeth unto righteousness"—into the remission of sins (Rom. 10:10).

"Lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and be converted and I should heal them"—forgive their sins (Acts 28:27).

"Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God" (1 John 5:1). When a man is "born of God," that implies that he has faith, that he has repented and that he is converted. When he is converted, that implies that he is born of God, that he has faith and also repentance. When he repents, that implies faith, conversion, born of God. And, when he has gospel faith, that implies repentance and conversion and born of God. These are all co-ordinate moral factors that cannot exist alone, that involve each other in the very nature of things. But they do not thus involve baptism. And, yet, baptism stands, in the New Testament, plainly connected with the remission of sins, with regeneration and with salvation.

Evidently there is a difference between the moral and legal aspects of this subject—between actual and formal remission.

A BUSINESS TALK TO BUSINESS MEN ABOUT CHRISTIANITY.*

BY PRESIDENT L. M. SNIFF.

My first thought was to come to you with an exhortation to be good and hold up the hands of the missionaries. I was disposed to class you as money makers, saving 95 per cent for yourself and grudgingly giving 5 per cent for the good of the world. Then to classify the preachers as men giving all for the world. To classify you as worldly and ourselves as holy—sanctified. But the more I thought, the nearer I have brought the two classes together, and I'll now say my aim in this short address is to show unity in this diversity; in short, I believe there is no responsibility resting upon the preacher that does not rightly rest upon the shoulders of the business man. And second, that there is no claim to holiness, sanctity and honor rightly made by one that does not belong to the other. Now you must allow me to place this before you in my own way. I'll take you through some dry, hard facts. Let us consider the two fields in which we all work toward the one end, that end being the flooding of the world with the power and thought of God.

The root of all morality is Theism. I say, briefly, no God, then no morality; no Fatherhood of God, then no brotherhood of man. Theism, then, is permanent. There is a mathematical revelation of God as well as a Bible revelation.

Of late somewhat has been said about new grounds of Theistic belief. I'd say, Better go to mathematics to get it than to philosophy. There is not a mathematical formula but is as much the thought and expression of God as the Ten Commandments or the Sermon on the Mount. Not so with the deductions of speculative philosophy. The business man deals immediately with this side of Theism; the preacher deals immediately with Bible Theism. Both are sacred, and one no more so than the other.

We call this civilization Christian, and well we do so. There is not a wheel that turns but by the law of God. Straight lines, curves, solids, motion and so on are elements. No man can make a straight line. I place upon the blackboard my picture, but it is imperfect. The only straight line is a thought. It is God's thought and is an equation of the first degree. I place upon the board my illustration of a circle. I can't make it perfect. The real circle is a thought and the thought of God. It is an equation of the second degree. The same is true of an ellipse — parabola and hyperbola. They are all mathematical equations — all thoughts of God. All matter moving in space moves according to these laws.

The visible, tangible crown of our civilization is the machine. The machine is the balancing of the laws of God applied to lines, curves, solids and motives. Every machine already put forth and all that are to come are in the thought of God, and all perfect. The imperfection we see in machines is due to the imperfection of human skill. The law is perfect, but the human execution is imperfect. Could we make a machine perfect according to the law of God, then it would run without friction. When I was a boy we had the old threshing machine called "the grubber." It consisted of a cylinder and a strong case enclosing it. It was nearly cubical in form and not over four feet in dimension. It took eight strong horses to revolve that cylinder. It had to be tied to the earth with great ropes and stakes. We could hear it roar for three miles. We now have "the separator"—a machine that more than doubles the efficiency of "the grubber." It does not take half the horse power. It is gentle and need not be chained to the earth. You drive along the road and see it at work 100 yards from you, but don't hear it. The unsophisticated would say "the grubber" has the power in it, but not so. There are two engines near my house; one is about 20-horse power, the other 100. The little engine shakes the ground for 100 feet about it. The other one is noiseless and steady. Why all this bluster and noise on the one hand and unpretentious power on the other? Simply because the powerful smooth machine was made by mechanics who were guided by the mathematical law, and the boisterous machine was made by imitation.

All that noise and fuss is nature's protest against violated law. All mechanical devices are safe and efficient in proportion to their approximation to the law of God.

The engineer or architect hands over to the builder a plan for a railroad or a bridge or a house or a machine. There are the mathematical formula—the laws of God. He knows the importance of those laws—how property and life are involved. It never has entered into the mind of the mathematician to dare to build except by these laws. Hence, I say this civilization, even on its material side, is Christian. Every well-running device speaks of obedience to God's laws. I look upon Mr. Edison as a man of great reverence. When once he has gone to the mathematician and chemist for the laws underlying a machine he would invent, he sets about to make the device in strict obedience to the laws. If the machine works not as he would have it, though it may be an astonishment to the world, he throws it upon the waste heap and goes back to the law of God and builds anew. The Bible theologians would do well to imitate science here, by going back to the law of God to get a more perfect church. This explains wherein science is progressive. Retrogression would set in when we abandon the law of God and build by copying after some good machine.

Now, gentlemen, your life has been cast with this kind of theology. You trust God in this, you risk your all on his law. When Edison went to a business man with his first invention, that man turned the machine over to the experts and the next day said to Edison: "You can have $40,000 for it." That was sublime; that was faith in God's law. Edison did not know what to do with the money. The man said: "Put it in the bank, keeping what you want to spend." He says it then dawned upon him that money was to spend, and then he was happy, while before it was a burden to him. Since that day Edison has been happy in spending money to the glory of God and the betterment of humanity.

But God has made another revelation which I call his Bible revelation. According to this he "so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but receive everlasting life."

The human soul could not be whitened without the death of the Son of God. In it God says, "Come unto me all ye who are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." This kind of truth could not be revealed by mathematical formulæ. The New Testament is a divine poem, and its theme is love—the love of God—revealed by the tragedy of Calvary. In the Theism of the Bible man finds his place, and we learn to stand before him with evident and becoming awe, be he white, black or yellow. This sublime and awful truth has not been given in vain. The nations of the world are beginning to see the coming of the glory of the kingdom of God—the brotherhood of man. The grandest answer ever given back to God by a nation is the Declaration of Independence. Sir William Hamilton said: "The greatest thing in the world is man, and the greatest thing in man is mind." Gentlemen, the noblest ambition that can possess the heart of a man is to pour into the benighted minds of other men a floodtide of the light and power of God. Has your Theism any of this light and power to give? I answer, Everything.

They don't want your Theism or ours, but once they get us and the Book, then they want your machine and will pay for it. Herein lies your temptation—to make merchandise out of your religion. The business man who does business to save money for selfish ends is of the same class as the preacher who preaches with the same end in view. Neither has caught the enthusiasm of humanity.

The business man who does business that he with others may send the light and the thought of God to the dark corners of the world is the same as the preacher who preaches to the same end.

There is not a responsibility mine that is not yours; not a glory possible for me that is not possible for you. I turn to the preachers: We are one—business men and preachers, blessed with the highest honors—colaborers with God. Let us be admonished not to do anything that would lead to the creating of holy orders among us. All God's laws are sacred; all who work with him are on sacred ground. Our temptation is to take the Word of light and love into the laboratory for analysis. As well refuse to breathe the pure air of the mountain or to bathe in the light of the sun until we have bottled them up and analyzed them. They tell us it is chilly, like the atmosphere of an iceburg, in these man-made laboratories for the analysis of the bread of life! The gospel is light; we should bathe in it. It is bread; we should eat it. Let the young man who would preach commit the New Testament to his memory and his heart. In the gospel God whispers his love to us.

Speaking of the heavenly bodies, such as planets, satellites and wandering stars, mathematicians tell us that the curve each moves in, be it ellipse, parabola or hyperbola, depends on three things: (1) The direction given it when cast forth by the initial cause; (2) The distance from the sun; (3) The velocity. Gentlemen, what things are to determine the attitude of the world to the Son of God? I could not answer fully if I had the time, but I will say that as God who, somewhere and sometime, way back in the eternities, was the initial cause of the motion of our heavens, so I would say he gives to us the gospel and in its relation to the world of ignorant and suffering humanity, he makes you and me the initial cause, and with that responsibility placed upon you I am done.

Missouri Endeavorers, Attention!

At the state convention at Jefferson City I was elected to the office of state superintendent of Christian Endeavor. On assuming the office I find no funds whatever with which to prosecute the work. By repeated resolution the societies have been asked to contribute the sum of $1.00 to support the work. If all would do this sufficient money would be raised to carry on the work and support this office in away compatible with our numerical strength and standing in the state. To look after the interests of Christian Endeavor among the Disciples of Christ in Missouri costs something more than time and energy. It costs money. Will not each society aid in the work? Do not delay, but attend to it now. Will not pastors call attention of societies to this matter? Send all money to my address.

CLAUDE E. HILL,
State Superintendent

Pleasant Hill, Mo.

Our Budget.

—Next week our Thanksgiving number.

—If you need some extra copies to hand to your friends whom you wish to subscribe, send for them.

—Christianity is neither popular nor practical in the devil's domain.

—They that put their trust in the Lord are best prepared to endure great hardships, long privations and sore trials.

—"Bodily exercise profiteth little," costeth much, and, from the college standpoint, is exceedingly dangerous

—The mad rush for wealth is pulling the people of this world apart; the rich are becoming richer and the poor poorer.

—There are signs of a deep spiritual awakening in many of the churches which prophesy a large ingathering.

—Let the aim of every church and every pastor and every evangelist be, not so much to add numbers to the church, but to turn people to the Lord.

—Let there be a revival of Bible study, of prayer, of church attendance and of direct, incisive and persuasive preaching of the gospel—the sweet old gospel of redeeming love.

—Training classes ought to follow every ingathering into the church that new converts may be taught how to pray and how to live and how to do some work for Christ in the church.

—Let us waive critical problems and difficult questions for the time being while we deal with the fundamental issues of the gospel. Let us seek to bring men face to face with Jesus Christ and have them decide whether they will accept him as Savior and Lord or not.

—Theoretically civilization means employment, food, shelter, clothing, books, music, schools and churches; but practically it means favoritism, monopoly, power, politics, unlimited individual and corporate wealth, and war.

—This issue will be a living issue as long as the world stands and until human redemption is completed and long after the little questions that now claim so much attention shall have been forgotten or outgrown in the onward march of truth. "What shall I do with Jesus?" is the perennial question of the ages.

—The one word that should receive supreme emphasis in all our evangelistic work is repentance. Let it be explained and illustrated until it is thoroughly understood that no soul can come to God acceptably without turning away from sin in purpose and in life. This has frequently been the difficulty in evangelistic meetings.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is glad to be a coworker with all the other agencies and forces of the church in extending the kingdom of God and in winning men to a truer allegiance to Jesus Christ. We would be glad to welcome brief (column and half column) articles full of the tender persuasions of the gospel and motives for living the Christian life.

—We are grateful to our friends all over the country for their many words of cheer and encouragement, showing that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is not only holding its old friends, but gaining a host of new ones. If space permits we hope to publish brief extracts from a number of these letters in our next week's issue. We hope to do the best year's work which the paper has ever done, and we solicit the co-operation of all our readers in extending its area and influence.

—F. G. Tyrrell, late pastor of the Central Christian Church, this city, now pastor of the First Christian Church, Chicago, will deliver a lecture in the Central Christian Church on Friday evening of this week on "Fun in Fact and in Fiction," under the auspices of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. Bro. Tyrrell's congregation in Chicago tendered him a reception last week which was a very happy affair all around, in which representatives of various congregations in the city participated. It was the close of the first six months of his work in that city, and there have been 99 additions to the church within that time. He is greatly encouraged with the outlook of the work.

—The article which we have entitled, "A Business Talk to Business Men About Christianity," which appears elsewhere, was the first of the addresses delivered to the business men's meeting at Cincinnati, of which the last one was delivered by Bro. Atkinson. Aside from this fact, which lends it special interest, we commend it for its fine thought, and for its modern and up-to-date conception of the relation of business of every kind to the kingdom of God, and the manifestation of God's will in all the forces and activities of life. Reference was made to this article in our edition of Nov. 9th, but we were not able to find room for it in that number as we had expected.

—On Thursday evening of last week, W. W. Hopkins, of this paper, was treated to a surprise dinner party at his beautiful surburban place near Kirkwood, by his wife, on the occasion of his 49th birthday. Among those present were Brother and Sister W. D. Harrison, of this city; Bro. Gillett, pastor at Tuxedo, and his wife, and the editor of this paper and his wife. It was a beautiful moonlit evening. Mrs. Hopkins had spread a bountiful repast, the party all seemed to be happy, and not the least pleased was our faithful assistant, whom we are sure our readers will join us in wishing many happy returns.

—We present our readers this week, on our first page, with the face of one whose picture is less familiar to them than his name and his work. William Worth Dowling is the Nestor of our Sundey-school editors and publishers. He began the publication of "The Little Sower," the first distinctly Sunday-school publication of the Christian Church, Jan. 1st, 1865, at Indianapolis. He moved to St. Louis and became identified with the Christian Publishing Company in 1877, and from that until the present time has been managing our Sunday-school publications. The "Little Sower" was consolidated with the "Sunday-school Evangelist" in 1883, and of this he remains editor, as also of "Our Young Folks," "The Little Ones" and our various Sunday-school quarterlies, besides being the author of "The Lesson Commentary," "The Lesson Helper," "The Lesson Mentor," "The Les-Primer," "Bible Handbook," "The Normal Instructor," "The Helping Hand," "Christian Psalter" and numerous smaller works. As this will indicate, he is a man of unceasing intellectual industry, a tireless worker, and one who loves his home, his office and his regular work so well that he seldom meets with his brethren in their great conventions. For this reason we are glad to present this week an excellent likeness of him without his knowledge or consent, but for the benefit of a large number who have for many years been benefited by his writings. Bro. Dowling is a native of Ohio, but he has spent most of his public life in Indianapolis and St. Louis. He was at one time teacher in Northwestern Christian University, now Butler College, but the larger part of his life has been devoted to writing literature for the children and young people. We are not informed as to the exact year of his birth, but his picture, which is made from a recent photograph, shows that he is still enjoying the strength of a vigorous manhood and is capable of rendering many years of efficient service in the field in which he was a pioneer. Bro. Dowling is now, and has been for a number of years, ably assisted in his editorial work by his daughter, Miss Metta Dowling, who is associated with him in the editorship of the various Sunday-school periodicals above mentioned.

—We had forgotten about the Octographic Rewiew, not having seen or even heard of it for years, until we saw a notice of it in the Herald and Presbyter of last week. Our Presbyterian contemporary quoted a paragraph from it which shows that, while for some inscrutable reason Providence still permits it to exist, it is unchanged in its spirit and aim. It is still a stirrer up of strife among brethren. Referring to the number of our preachers that occupied Presbyterian pulpits during the Jubilee Convention, the O. R. is quoted as saying: "Our 'Disciple brethren' still teach the old heresy of immersion for the remission of sins and still regard the 'undipped Presbyterians' as out of Christ and strangers to the covenants of promise Even the Christian Standard does not admit that they are pardoned and accepted of God." It is further quoted by the Herald and Presbyter as saying that the convention at Cincinnati was the "jubilee of a society that aims to proselyte all Presbyterians, Methodists and other sectarians, disorganize their churches and render their creeds obsolete." The object of this screed is too obvious to need mention.

—The Herald and Presbyter takes the Octographic seriously, as if it were a representative of the religious body which recently held its convention in Cincinnati, and says: "We should be glad to know from the Christian Standard whether it expresses the sentiments of the Disciple denomination. [Why not say, the Disciples of Christ?] Is the statement that it, the Standard, does not admit that Christians of other denominations 'are pardoned and accepted of God,' true? Does it believe that immersion is necessary to salvation or not?" The H. & P. further says: "We have supposed that the party represented by the Standard was in control of the recent jubilee, and that both it and the ministers who preached in Presbyterian pulpits recognized Presbyterians as Christians. The Octographic, however, boldly declares that the Standard will not admit this. It seems to us that after the recent exchange of pulpit courtesies this challenge should be answered." While we do not think the Octographic needs to be taken seriously, the request of the Herald and Presbyter is not unreasonable, under the circumsances, and we hope the Standard will give it prompt attention. The question is, whether our position commits us to the attitude towards our religious neighbors indicated in these quotations. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has no hesitancy in repudiating these sentiments, both on its own behalf and on behalf of those whom it represents. Long ago we announced our conception of the relation of these great evangelical religious bodies to our own religious movement as that of "Allies, Not Foes." This does not prevent us from pointing out what we believe to be defects in their teachings and practices, as we often take occasion to do. But those who love Christ and honor Him as their Lord are our brothers and sisters, not aliens.

—In our Original Contribution department this week will be found an article from the able pen of Dr. A. B. Hinsdale, Ann Arbor, Mich., on "Is War Justifiable Between Christians?" which cannot fail to be of interest to our readers. Whatever your views on this subject you will find this a safe and timely article. It may not be as radical in its denunciation of war between the so-called Christian nations as some would like, but its inferences and conclusions are in harmony with the teaching of Christ, and therefore safe and right. We are always glad to hear from Dr. Hinsdale and to communicate his utterances on great themes to the brotherhood and to the world, and especially this plea-for-peace article at this time.

—Dr. Willett's article this week on the Sunday-school lesson theme, "The Drunkard and His Makers," should have appeared in our edition of last week, but it did not reach us in time, and it is too important and valuable an article to go unpublished. It may not reach all our schools in time for the lesson, but it will reach the larger number of those whose officers and teachers are ever alert to the best that can be said on each lesson, and the rest will appreciate it later. It is never too late nor out of date to write, talk or preach on temperance. Then, besides the distinctions pointed out in this article, and the location of responsibility upon the responsible parties, is worthy of special attention. Also the necessity for using all agencies, not excepting the ballot, to repress and crush the enemy that now threatens the destruction of society itself. You cannot fail to be interested deeply in what Dr. Willett has to say upon this momentous question.

—The article in this paper headed "Vice," by J. S. Hughes, of Chicago, may be stronger meat than some of our readers will relish, but this is Brother Hughes' style. He must cut to the bottom of what to him appears evil or not at all. And while he unmercifully scores those who are, to his keen sense of righteousness, in the way of righteousness, it must not be forgotten that there are those who cannot be too severely condemned for their open or their secret support of vicious things in the land. There is a use for the keenest satire and the most intense denunciation, but the best results for correcting evils in church or state do not come from a general and unguarded use of these tremendous weapons. However, we have no apologies to make for the promoters and the supporters of the liquor traffic, and inasmuch as the lesson of the schools for next Sunday is on this question we give our readers this dose of strong meat from the pen of our esteemed Bro. Hughes.

—We have heard many obstacles stated in the way of gold hunting in the Klondike, but never such an array of them as W. Dudley Mabry, of Washington, D. C., presents in his article in Self Culture for November on "A Trip to the Klondike." After enumerating the hardships of mountain climbing, river rapids, snow, heat, cold, mosquitos, frozen earth and a host of other physical difficulties, he says that the conditions imposed on the prospector by the Canadian Government are still more unendurable. He says there is first a tax of 20 per cent on the value of the miner's outfit; (2) five or 10 dollars to a broker for filling out the blank; (3) a surrender of one-half the gold-bearing ground discovered to the Canadian Government; (4) fifteen dollars and a royalty of 10 per cent of all gold taken out of the ground above $2,500; (5) 20 per cent if the mine yields $200 or over per day; (6) four to 10 dollars per month per foot of river front at Dawson used; (7) fifty to 70 dollars per cord for wood, etc. In fact, licenses, taxes, royalties, permits, etc., are so numerous and so severe that the following anecdote is told to give the stranger some conception of the miner's burdens in the Klondike: It is said that a miner being sick was informed that he must die, and was asked if he wished to see any one. "Send for Major Walsh," he said. On being asked what he wanted with Major Walsh, he replied, "I haven't any permit, and if I should undertake to die without one I would get arrested!" And yet the British make loud complaint of the taxes, etc., imposed upon foreigners in the Transvaal country.

—Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, who claims to live only in the realm of ideas, is about to collide with something of a somewhat denser nature. She has been sued for slanderous talk by Mrs. Josephine Curtis Woodbury in the sum of $150,000. This experience may leave her with at least a subconscious attachment to something of more weight than her ideal affusions.

—The effort to popularize the church by entertainments is a work of supererogation: God does not ask us to popularize his temple, but to keep it holy. It cannot be made popular with sinners and retain its favor with God. The Bible is not a popular book with sinners, and you cannot hope to make the church, which is a product of the Bible, popular. Both the Bible and the church should have one voice toward sin and one hope for the sinner. Whenever a church, so called, becomes popular with the world you may know that it has lost its divine savor. The only sense in which a church can become popular with sinners is when they are making it the refuge of their souls from sin. There is no comfort for the sinner nor consolation for the saint in a church that is popular with the world on a compromise platform. Let the temple of God be holy.

—On November 12th the church at Chillicothe, Mo., pledged $625 to our Church Extension work. This was done after an address made by our secretary of Church Extension urging Missouri to come to the front this year in helping to reach our first quarter of a million for Church Extension. Brother L. E. McCray is pastor there and had done splendid work in the way of preparing the church for the visit of a missionary secretary. When we think of the gift of $1,000 by Independence, Mo., on the 5th of November, and this raising of $625 by Chillicothe, it looks as if Missouri intended to be the banner state this year in gifts to Church Extension. Missouri will no doubt furnish the largest delegation of any state to the National Convention, which meets in Kansas City in October, 1900, and she will no doubt lead in gifts to Church Extension. The Board of Church Extension is the only national board located in that state. Missourians should take a just pride in seeing that Missouri comes to the front in gifts for that work. We expect to see liberal gifts from other churches later on, and no doubt other states will follow the creditable example set by Missouri.

—The Standard, Chicago, asks, "Why So Few Baptisms?" and begins an editorial answer to the question in a recent number by stating that "there is not a state in this part of the country in which the additions to Baptist churches during the past year have been adequate to the resources employed or even to the normal rate of increase." If true, there is some occasion for alarm in this statement as it may apply to other than Baptist churches. The Standerd, however, does not believe, as some, that the cause is due to higher criticism, but finds a more plausible answer to the question in the lack of organized, consecrated labor in the churches. There is a great leakage, it says, in the Sunday-schools and in the homes. Then again, the churches' real work is obscured by the things announced each Sunday from the pulpit, and the worship lacks reverence. We think that the criticisms of the Standard are, in the main, well taken, and worthy of prayerful consideration. Let us not, Adamlike, try to unload this blame upon somebody else. Our churches are not what they should and could be in these respects.

—One brother in our evangelistic reports states that their city is besieged with Holiness people, 30 to 50 Mormon elders and Blanford, the "divine healer." This is certainly confusion confused. Such a community certainly has our sympathy.

—The Texas Lectursship will meet in Greenville, Dec. 5-8. The Courier says that 37 names appear on the program, to whom have been assigned various duties, addresses, papers, etc., and predicts one of the best gatherings in its history.

—In an article in the Treasury of Religious Thought for November Prof. John Moore, writing on the religious conditions in Germany, presents this singular paradox: He says that the Socialists of Germany, who now cast one-fifth of the votes of the empire, have 74 political and 54 economical journals, are generally of materialistic and atheistic tendencies. Their leaders, he says, are largely avowed materialists and atheists, and yet they are about all members of the state church. With this view of conditions upon the one hand and that of the influence of higher criticism upon the other, we do not wonder at the lack of Bible-schools, prayer-meetings and devotional services in their larger cities, of which he lamentingly speaks. And yet it is possible that the atheistic tendencies of the socialists find their apology in the state church, of which they are members. They are largely working people, and in them the clergy and the church take no special interest. And in this let our own churches take warning If Socialism is on the increase in America and atheistic in its tendencies, the churches will have themselves largely to blame for the harvest. "If the principles of Jesus Christ were practiced by society there would be no ground for Socialism," said an atheistic socialist. No religion is not much worse than a formal one, and the Socialism of Germany may yet become a factor in bringing about that radical Christian reformation which she to-day so greatly needs.

"A Good Name At Home

Is a Tower of Strength Abroad." This truth has been perfectly verified by the history of Hood's Sarsaparilla, which effected its first cures in Lowell, Mass., where it is made and where it still has a larger sale than all other blood purifiers. Its fame and cures and sales have spread abroad all over the world, and it is universally recognized as the best blood medicine money can buy.

—Already there are hints from our secretaries of a reaction of interest in missionary affairs since the Jubilee Convention. This is almost unavoidable in some degree when the enthusiasm of the convention is taken into consideration. But there should be a heroic effort on the part of both preachers and churches to prevent that which in reality need not and ought not to occur.

—Dwight L. Moody had to abandon his meeting in Kansas City last week on account of heart trouble. It is said that he was addressing immense throngs of people each night in Convention Hall. He started for Northfield, Mass., on the evening of the 17th instant, in a special car, accompanied by a physician. His friends have expressed the fear that his work is done. Mr. Moody, though not a regularly ordained minister, has, nevertheless, been one of the most prominent preachers of America for the past quarter of a century, and of world-wide reputation. But of all his works probably that of the founding of the Chicago Bible Institute will be most enduring. Later report says that Mr. Moody had greatly improved since leaving Kansas City. A night's rest in his special car largely restored his vigor.

—Our English Topics this week, from Bro. Durban, are of unusual interest. It is Bro. Durban's last article to our columns before sailing for England, and in it are some comparisons and contrasts that will make us feel just a little taller, now that we are Americans. Bro. Durban departs from Paul's rule and makes some comparisons and measurements that seem to leave a balance to our credit even in the lesser dimensions of our drink houses, but more especially in the religious conditions described. And still there is room for improvement, and will be until the drink traffic is abolished and the unity for which Jesus prayed is established in our land and throughout the earth. We thank Bro. Durban for his eloquent tribute to the people, homes and cities visited while in America, and for the good things he says about our country. We shall certainly be glad to have Bro. Durban and his family come again, and come even as far as unto St. Louis, though that be not half across the empire.

—The Christian Endeavor World predicts a general revival of religion in the churches this winter, based chiefly on Mr. Moody's expectation. Mr. Moody is a close observer of general religious conditions, therefore a good point at which to feel the pulse of the religious world; but we have other evidences of a general forward movement of the churches in the reports from the field. Protracted meetings are increasing, both in frequency and numerical results, and we think these somewhat better indications of the condition of the great heart of the church than any preacher's opinion. And then everybody seems to be expecting a forward movement, and what everybody expects usually comes to pass. But not without effort, of course. There must be much work done, much preaching and more praying, to bring it about.

—The Disciple for November opens with a leading article from the pen of Dr. H. L. Willett on the "Life and Teaching of Jesus." This magazine is published in Gloucester, England.

—The following message comes to us just as we go to press. It is self explanatory. We regret the loss and the inconvenience, but are glad to know that the school work continues:

CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—The Academy Home of our Mountain Mission burned on the 13th, between nine and ten o'clock in the morning. There was an insurance of $3,100 on the house and furniture. While the loss is severe, yet we are not disheartened. We are making temporary arrangements to take care of all boarders during the winter and spring, and we will rebuild with the return of summer. The prospects for a large attendance during the winter and spring were never better.

—Church members who love to dance should be willing for Christ to furnish the music.

—The University Record says that 556 volumes were added to the university library during the month of October, of which 336 volumes were by purchase.

—The following is news as she is printed in the Christian Guide:

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Nov. 9 gives an explanation of their views on higher criticism, and why Bro. J. H. Garrison resigned as editor of that paper.

—J. Z. Tyler announces the following lectures to occupy six successive Lord's day evenings in the Euclid Avenue Church of Cleveland, O., beginning Nov. 5:

Nov. 5. The Historical Books of the Old Testament.
Nov. 12. The Prophets and the Prophetic Literature of the Old Testament.
Nov. 19. The Poetry and the Poetical Books of the Old Testament.
Nov. 26. The History between the Testaments.
Dec. 3. The Narratives of the Earth-life of our Lord.
Dec. 10. The Planting and the Training of the Church.

These lectures are planned to cover the entire Bible and would make an excellent course of lectures in any church.

—Sometime ago there was no little stir in the papers about the conversion of Marshall O. Waggoner, of Toledo, O., from infidelity to the Christian religion, especially for the reason that the gramophone was stated to be the leading factor in his conversion. The conversion was so complete that Mr. Waggoner burned his collection of infidel books on the evening of August 19th, of the present year, in the street in front of the Memorial U. B. Church, in Toledo. As the gramophone seems to be a new factor in the religious field, the extent to which it was instrumental in the conversion of Mr. Waggoner becomes a matter of interest and is stated by him in the following paragraph from the Gramophone Record. Mr. Waggoner gives his explanation of this remarkable experience which is not without interest. It will be well to note, however, that the Bible was a prominent part of the program and, of course, equally important as a factor in his conversion:

On the night of Nov. 19th last, under the most awful conviction, at about 8:30 in the evening, I made up a program for a religious service in my lonely room, consisting of the twenty-third Psalm, closing with the Lord's Prayer, the sacred song, "Almost Persuaded," also the sacred songs, "Just as I am Without one Plea" and "Rock of Ages," where, with my Savior as leader, I played and replayed the above and sang, read my old family Bible until about three o'clock in the morning, when I can safely say I received relief from my load of unbelief and infidelity, and a happier man does not dwell on this mundane sphere. From this I can say from my own personal experience, the gramophone was one of the main factors (earthly) through the greatest of all power which brought me to the light of my Savior's countenance. You can readily see how strongly attached I am to your God-given instrument—the great talking machine—the God-given gramophone.

—Now that you have had a foretaste of Bro. Aylsworth's comments on "In His Steps," in our last edition, you will be the more eager for his second and concluding article in this paper. The touch of the spirit of Thanksgiving day will also add to the beauty and sweetness of the article, notwithstanding the consciousness of our failure to follow "in his steps" in our daily doings as we should. We feel that we cannot too highly commend this article. It is an eloquent comment upon the gospel of Christ, a beautiful uplifting of the Christian standard of deportment, a sublime chapter on pastoral duties. But Bro. Aylsworth is not a stranger to our readers and his own words are the best commendation we can give of the productions of his spiritually guided pen on vital Christian themes.

—Prof. Willett is not an instance of a prop et without honor in his own country or cit judging by the announcements of lectu courses on Bible topics which he is carryi on in that city. One course is under the a spices of the Pastors' Conference of Evansto in co-operation with the Bible Study Leagu consisting of eight studies in the "History Prophecy." Another course is at the Dow town Center of the Bible Study League at 1 La Salle St., at the noon hour each Mond for six weeks, beginning Nov. 13. Still anoth course of 12 lectures is at the Scoville Institu Auditorium under the direction of the Oa Park Sunday-school Union. The Universi of Chicago officially announces that Prof. Wi lett, instructor in Semetic Languages and Li erature in that institution, will devote his enti time from January 1 to April 1 of each yea giving systematic lectures on the literatur history and interpretation of the Bible, in vie of the great demand for such courses. Th demand is a most encouraging sign of th times. No man among us is doing so much awaken popular interest in Bible study as Pro Willett.

—The state of New York has made a ne and commendable departure in the care of i epileptics. At Sanyea, N. Y., thay have bee colonized in a way that secures greater com fort, more cures and the means of maintenance At least one acre of ground is allowed to eac patient, and the buildings are simple, twe story houses, suited to their condition. Of th benefits of this method over that of other state the Chicago Record says:

Under the colony system as it exists in Ne York the epileptic is enabled, wholly in som cases, and in others partially, to earn hi livelihood. By virtue of the protection an convenience afforded him in the colony and c the hygienic conditions thrown about his lif the disease of the epileptic is greatly modified and sometimes cured. According to moderat estimates there are 7,500 epileptics in Illinois They are in poorhouses, insane hospitals, th school for feeble-minded or in private homes The colony plan, as it is in use in New York is the best system of caring for these unfor tunates It contributes greatly to their com fort and peace of mind, and in the end i cheaper for the state, because under this sys tem a larger number get well, and in nearly al cases the severity of the disease is modified.

—A writer in the Standard, Chicago, de votes more than a page to the question, "Hov to get rid of a Pastor." A disgruntled church member could answer that question in abou two minutes, if not in about three words. Th usual method pursued is to either talk him out starve him out, or vote him out; and th answer of the disgruntled church membe would depend upon the stage at which th proceedings had arrived at the propounding o the question. The manly way, if go he should would be a frank and open statement to th pastor, by the most spiritually minded of th flock, of the reasons necessitating the change that is, provided he had not already seen th same and himself proposed the change. Hov to get hold of a good pastor and keep him, we think a more important question for church consideration. In cases of misfits the dissolu tion of relations should be neither difficult no delicate, and is not, where the Spirit of Chris prevails.

—The Church of Christ at Fort Dodge, Iowa, will be dedicated December 3. B. S Denny, state secretary, and state superintendent o Christian Endeavor, J. M. Lucas, will assist the pastor, W. J. ESTEY PIANOS AND ORGANS
Excel in Superior Tone, Perfect Construction and Great Durability.
THE ESTEY CO., 916 OLIVE ST., ST. LOUIS, MO.

PERSONAL MENTION.

Prof. Fred F. Grim writes that the new church house in Stephensport, Ky., was dedicated Nov. 12th.

E. L. Nickle, pastor of the church in Lorimer, Ia , is being assisted in a protracted meeting at that point by Edgar Price.

C C. Deweese, pastor of the church at Cheney, Kan., is being assisted in a protracted meeting at that point by Prof. O. F. Bilgers, leader of song.

The sermons recently preached by Elder Bryan in East Side Christian Church, Moberly, Mo., were complimented very highly by the people and by the press of that city.

F. M. Cummings will continue to preach in Marlboro and New Baltimore, O , but he removed from Marlboro to Cuyahoga Falls, which place he expects to make his permanent home.

C. A. Gersin, of Burlington, Col., writes that the church there would like to correspond with some one that could be secured to hold a protracted meeting for them.

W. W. Sniff, we understand, has accepted a call to the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, O. Bro. Sniff was once pastor of the Compton Heights Church, this city, but goes to Cleveland from Gibson City, Ill.

Miss Grace Bishop, granddaughter of ex-Governor Bishop, was married to Geo. H. Hunt, of Tennessee, in this city, on last Wednesday evening. The ceremony was pronounced by F. O. Fannon, pastor First Christian Church.

T. R. Overton, pastor of the church at Mapleton, Kan., for one-half time writes encouragingly of the outlook there. He has been there but a short time and has organized a Y. P. S. C E., a midweek prayer-meeting and other activities essential to spiritual growth.

David Martin, of Richland, Ia., writes that he would like to hold one or two protracted meetings for the free will offering of the people, or would accept pastoral work.

Any church in railroad connection with St. Louis wanting preaching once or twice per month or pulpit supply for a time can be accommodated by addressing "Preacher," care of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Baxter Waters, pastor Central Christian Church, this city, recently read an interesting paper to our preachers on "Hosea's Message in the Light of His Experience." The paper elicited an interesting and profitable discussion on the following week, led by D. R. Dungan, pastor Mt. Cabanne Church.

F. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, is to deliver a lecture in Central Christian Church, this city, on Friday evening. His theme will be "Fun in Fact and in Fiction." As this will be Bro. Tyrrell's first address in this city since his resignation of the Central pulpit he will doubtless be greeted with a large audience.

T. J. Legg, field secretary for Indiana, asks all Indiana preachers whose names are not on the yearbook for 1899, and all preachers who have changed residence during the year to send their names and address to him at Logansport, Ind., at once, that a revised list may be completed by Dec. 1st.

The church at Princeton, Ill., gave their new minister, Bro. J. G. Waggoner, and his wife a surprise reception recently. Each brought his bundle, a substantial token of friendship and good will, giving quite a start to housekeeping. Such cordial fellowship is very helpful and encouraging.

A. O. Swartwood, pastor of the church at Waterloo, Neb., writes that the congregation there is taking on new life. A new organ has been placed in the house preparatory to a protracted meeting to begin in January next; it has also elected officers and the sisters have been active in the collection of funds for church work.

I. H. Fuller, who is now located with the church at Wapello, Ia., says that audiences there are increasing. Nov. 12 the church elected two elders and four deacons and will enter into a closer and more helpful organization. Bro. Vandevort, the senior elder, is down sick and can not attend the services.

F. O. Fannon reports that in his two years' work as pastor of the First Christian Church in this city there have been 400 additions, and that mostly without protracted meeting effort. We believe that one such meeting was held last winter by J. Z. Tyler, of Cleveland, O. Bro. Fannon is also in great demand for addresses on special occasions with fraternities and semi-religious gatherings. He is to address the annual banquet of the Odd Fellows of this city this week.

Henry Van Middlesworth, who preaches for the East End Church, Plainview, N. J., informs us that the pastor of the First Church in that city is J. B. Cleaver, that of the Second, Hiram A. Mears, and that of the Third, D. Blow. We are glad to know that we have four churches in that city.

The sisters of the church in Blue Mound, Ill., recently prepared a surprise for Mrs. Crank, wife of J. R Crank, the pastor, consisting of a new Goodrich sewing machine, a Seth Thomas clock, $16.50 in cash and a lot of eatables. Total, about $50. Bro. Crank and his wife, who is also a preacher, have been retained by the church another year and state that they will have some spare time which some of the churches near them may be able to use.

M. E. Harlan and his wife, who recently went from Topeka, Kan., to Brooklyn, N. Y., were tendered a most cordial welcome by the church to which he has been called. The rooms were beautifully decorated and each one of the six churches in New York City, as is reported, was represented by its pastor and a delegation. We are glad to see this exhibition of sisterly love. The intellectual, social and material refreshment combined must indeed have been an enjoyable feast of love.

In speaking of the protracted meeting in Lexington, Mo., the News of that city says: "The meeting has been a remarkable one in several respects. One is that there has been little or no excitement The preaching has been splendid and done by the pastor, Elder Fenstermacher, who has preached many plain, soul-stirring sermons which have done untold good. Many of the converts have come from the Sunday school, in some cases whole classes becoming Christians."

M. E. Harlan, who has recently become the pastor of the Sterling Place Christian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y , was born in Indiana, raised in Iowa, graduated in Drake and wrought in Kansas. His first pastorate was in Wellington. He next became state evangelist. Then followed his three years' pastorate with the First Church in Atchison, and last, prior to his call to Brooklyn, his pastorate in the First Church of Topeka. Bro. Harlan has been one of the most active and influential preachers of Kansas, and that state sustains a great loss in his removal. But the Lord evidently needed Brother and Sister Harlan, his most excellent wife, in Brooklyn and we congratulate the church there on securing a pastor and his wife so efficient in the Master's work.

Bro. Darsie's "Plea for the Homeless."

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I scarcely ever read a number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST but what it makes me want to say something. I have just finished reading Bro. Darsie's "Plea for the Homeless," and it makes me want to say something so bad that I make the venture, with the hope that it may help somebody in some way or other to open their eyes, their minds, their hearts and their pocketbooks, for Church Extension. The plea is strong and earnest, as coming from the heart of a disciple indeed and in truth. So forcefully does he hold forth the necessity and reasonableness of the cause he pleads that cold indeed must be the disciple's heart that is not touched after reading it. It makes me feel, though small as I am, that I will grow still smaller if I do not find some way of contributing more to that fund in the future than I have in the past. Brethren and sisters, if any of you have not read it, please read it. You will find it in the November numbers, the 2nd and 9th. I think it will stir your pure hearts and minds in places which have been lying dormant all this while.

English Topics.

HOW THE AMERICAN AND BRITISH PEOPLE DIFFER.

We are all aware that we can understand nothing at all about any subject or any object by regarding it absolutely, but that we soon begin to comprehend at least a little when we look at things relatively. As soon as we have instituted a comparison between one thing and another we find that we understand something of each. So, now that I, as an Englishman, have seen something of the United States I propose to draw a few inferences for the information of my readers. I have been impressed with the immense difference between an English village and an American. In the typical village of England you are at once struck by the dominating position and aspect of one particular edifice. The old parish church seems to own the whole place. It always overshadows the few streets that make up the little collection of dwellings. If the village is located on a hill, the parish church is certain to crown the height. To it all the cottages seem to crouch in obeisance. As the clergyman goes about the parish he wears the appearance of a little incarnate demi-god. He is not the same flesh and blood as other men. To him all the farmers pay tithes. Within my own boyish recollection people used to be put in prison if they refused to pay the tithe. This is not now possible, but the tithe system still flourishes, short only of that terror. When I was a Baptist minister of Chester one of my deacons lost a large rick of hay. He had purchased it of a farmer, not knowing that the farmer owed unpaid tithe. Before the rick of hay could be removed it was seized by the vicar for tithe, and my friend had no redress for his heavy loss. The reverend gentleman who seized the hay is now dean of a cathedral city with a very large salary, for which he has little to do except to keep up his style and dignity.

CLERGY AND SQUIREARCHY.

Clergyman and squire walk together in an English country parish. They are the social Gog and Magog of the little community. The squire is always the chief landowner in the district, unless some earl, marquis or duke happens to reign in the region round about. Even then some squire is often the grand vizier to the sultan. The squire is the link between the plebeian and patrician orders. Squire Brown or Squire Tomkins is generally a proud lordling, disdainful of poor Hodge, the ploughman, and allied with the clergyman in regarding the helots of the soil all the poor villagers who, in the "good old times," so called, were denominated in Anglo-Saxon phrase "villeins." A "villein" was simply a villager, as was a pagan in the Roman days. England is still largely under the ancient feudal landed system, and it is mainly this which keeps the rural community throughout our lovely little land in degrading poverty. The Free Churches, otherwise called Dissenting or Nonconforming Churches, are in the fifty thousand villages of England, found meeting in mean little sanctuaries on which the Established Church arrogantly looks down in its beauty and its stately eminence. The village doctor and his family generally attend church and taboo chapel. Church and chapel in England generally stand distinctively for pride and lowliness. They are symbolical of the distinction between those who constitute "society," and those who are aliens, pariahs and exiles from the Mammon-worshiping goldbug caste, if I may apply an Americanism.

WHY DISESTABLISHMENT IS NEEDED.

It must be evident to every reader that something needs alteration in the social, economic and religious system I have delineated. And Disestablishment would in time effect very much of the needed modification. The great and arrogant Establishment of religion in favor of a single sect must be brought to the level of impartiality before the law. Now, contrast with the picture I have drawn a typical American village. I have seen villages and little towns in New York State, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Virginia and Ohio. I find nothing to remind me of the English village, excepting the language. The houses are nearly all of timber. Such a structure may be found in England, but it is very old; is thatched with straw; is exceedingly quaint, low, and festooned with honeysuckle, jasmine and other flowering creepers, if not with evergreen ivy; and it invariably has its little fenced garden of flowers and fruit trees. The villages are in general built of brick. The houses are mostly ancient, or are modifications of ancient little hovels, improved piecemeal and in patchwork. This is the English village. Not so with the American. Its dwellings all seem to me to have been taken out of a child's toy-box and enlarged. Then there are no fences to make every man's little cottage his own private castle. Every American home seems to be open to all the world. I think your villas on their open lawns are delightful to look upon, and each of them is a symbol of the free and sociable temperament of the nation. Then I note that equality is manifest in the aspect of the village churches. They all look as if opened yesterday for the first time, as if also taken from the toy-box, and as if intended to show that no form of religion is specially in favor. Thus there are charms peculiar to the English village, and there are different attractions about the American village. You cannot yet have our Old-World fascination. Your posterity will grow that in some types that will be developed and will be monumental. We want your new-born freedom and elasticity and adaptability.

ENGLISH PUCLIC HOUSE AND AMERICAN SALOON.

I turn to the Devil's churches in both countries. In London and all our cities we have to our sorrow to look on vast numbers of what we call public houses. They are never called saloons. They are exceedingly different. Many are what are styled "gin palaces." These are the enormous drinking shops at the finest corners. They are crowded at all hours of the day and far into the night. I am ashamed that women are exceedingly numerous in the crowd of the sots. As you pass a London gin palace you are shocked at the roar of the blasphemous revelry that issues from within as the evening wears on. Your American saloons are for the most part very much smaller than our drink houses. They are obscure and insignificant in aspect, with a few occasional exceptions. I cannot see women haunting the American saloons, and I accordingly extol the American woman, and I shall incessantly chant her praises when talking of America to the English people. In England the barmaid is a universal institution. We are always hard at work in England fighting the devil of drink. We inherit that curse, but can foresee the day when it will be scotched by the power of the gospel. Temperance workers in England are compelled to fight along different lines from those adopted in America. But they have wonderfully scared the great distillers and brewers, and the forces are rallying for tremendous conflicts to come.

GOING HOME TO ENGLAND.

I return with wife and daughter to our native land by the Oceanic, sailing for Liverpool Nov. 15, so that when these lines appear I shall be on British soil, or at any rate approaching the shores of Albion. What a story I shall have to tell! My impressions of America will certainly not encourage anybody who may hear them to disparage the land in which I have enjoyed overwhelming hospitality. I must some day come again to see more. The finale has been Niagara, which we left till the last. I am writing these lines in beautiful Brooklyn, where we spending the concluding days of this del as we commenced on landing to study America during a few days in this charming city on Long Island. I have had the privilege of spending a few days this week with dear old English friends in Buffalo, where I gave an address to Bro. Lloyd Darsie's congregation. Can there be any city much more fascinating than that? It is your American Interlaken. I did not like quitting Buffalo. I do not relish leaving New York. I disliked turning my back on Washington after those three days in Bro. Power's bijou villa. I very reluctantly departed from Cincinnati and that miniature Neapolitan palace in Walnut Hills where Bro. and Sister T. M. Worcester entertained me and Bro. Spring with princely profusion of all the good things that can be desired in this life. I stayed at Cynthiana with Bro. and Sister J. J. Haley, and was tantalized uncomfortably by the necessity of leaving that lovely little parsonage and pretty town in the Kentucky bluegrass. Well, life consists mainly of salutations and valedictories, of coming into charmed circles and going again. Farewell, beloved American friends, who have shown to an uninitiated Englishman so many of the wonders of your immeasurably and inconceivably great homeland! Good-bye, Columbia, whose genial and fruitful bosom will yet shelter countless millions more of those who would vainly seek to find the sweetness of freedom and of plenty in other lands! My comfort in sailing from the American shores is that I go home to the dear little island which cradled all this freedom and all this strength. Many a worthy toiler and many a young aspirant who needs opportunity and scope shall I advise to turn for hopeful destiny towards the setting sun.

The Pen in the Hand is worth two in the Mind.

If you have "a good mind to write to Dr. Pierce" take pen in hand and begin. Then you'll avoid the experience of Mrs. M. P. Davis, of Honaker, Russell Co., Va. She writes:

"For seven years I was confined to bed most of the time. I had ulceration of internal organs and female weakness. I had four doctors and they said I could not be cured.....After the doctors said I could not be cured I wrote to Doctor Pierce for advice.....I followed the advice he gave.....I feel better than I ever did. My friends say I do not look like the same woman. I am sorry I did not take Dr. Pierce's medicine when I first began to have poor health. I could have saved what I paid to humbugs."

No one ever regretted writing to Dr. Pierce for advice. Many have regretted not writing sooner.

Sick women are invited to consult Dr. Pierce by letter, free, and so obtain the opinion and advice of a specialist in diseases peculiar to women. All correspondence private. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

Dr. Pierce's Medical Adviser, 1008 pages, is sent free on receipt of stamps to defray expense of mailing only. Send 21 one-cent stamps for paper covers, or 31 stamps for cloth. Address as above.

New York Letter.

Bro. George B. Townsend, the new pastor at Troy, N. Y., starts into his work in the state with much encouragement. He is a graduate of Hiram College—in the class of '94—and having preached on Sundays during three years of his college course, he was well prepared by experience to take up regular work at Paulding, O., where he ministered until called to Troy. During his five years' ministry the church grew from a membership of 125 to over 300; a parsonage was purchased and the house of worship was enlarged. Bro. Townsend is a native of Delaware, and in coming into our Eastern field he has simply returned to his home section of the country. He says: "I believe and have always felt that the East is to be our greatest mission field; and I am glad to be able to work in it for the Master." On behalf of all the Disciples of Christ of the Empire State we extend Bro. Townsend a most hearty welcome.

On Thursday evening, Nov. 9th, the Sterling Place congregation, Brooklyn, gave Bro. M. E. Harlan, their new pastor, a cordial reception in the lecture room of the church. Bro. John R. Tolar presided and introduced the speakers; first of whom was Bro. C. C. Martin, elder, who on behalf of the congregation greeted and welcomed their new minister and wife. Bro. Harlan responded and closed by asking God's blessing on their work. S. T. Willis spoke words of welcome on behalf of the preachers of Greater New York, and the Rev. Dr. Farrar, of the First Reformed Church, gave greetings in the name of the neighboring ministers and churches. Brethren J. M. Philputt, B. Q. Denham, John L. Keevil and Chilton S. Dean all spoke on behalf of their respective congregations. A musical program was rendered and refreshments were served. It looks as if Bro. Harlan's coming will restore unity and bring greater prosperity to the Sterling Place congregation. We pray and hope that it may be so. He is very much encouraged at the outlook and expects to accomplish a good work. To Bro. and Sister Harlan we also extend a warm welcome to our great city and state, and wish for them abounding success in Christian service.

At the October meeting of the Disciples' Club of New York, Bro. M. C. Tiers read a paper on the "Periodical Literature of the Disciples of Christ, Past and Present," in which he considered the Christian Baptist, 1823-'30, and the Millennial Harbinger, 1830-'66, edited by Alexander Campbell and others; the American Christian Review, by Benjamin Franklin and George Rice; the Christian Leader, by John F. Rowe and James S. Belle; the Octographic Review, by Daniel Sommer; the Christian Standard, by Isaac Errett and J. A. Lord, and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, by J. H. Garrison. The work of these was mainly considered, with incidental reference to others of more or less note. The circumstances leading to the founding of each paper and their respective work and relation to the general work and purposes of the Disciples were considered somewhat in detail. The reading of the paper occupied 35 minutes, was endorsed and highly commended by the president, J. L. N. Hunt, and a vote of thanks was tendered the author.

A new church building is acknowledged to be the greatest need of the 169th Street Church in New York. The present structure is about 30 years old, is severely plain and altogether inadequate to the growing demands of this great field, in this great city. At our last annual meeting the church considered the matter and appointed a building fund committee to devise ways by which to secure funds toward a new building. Our congregation, though rich in faith and good works, is financially poor and cannot possibly build unless assistance from without is secured. The plat on which our building now stands is worth and would bring about $16,000, and is clear of debt. The needed building would cost $30,000 at least. If we should sell our present site, another as advantageously located would cost all ours would bring in the market, or nearly so. Therefore, we will have to raise, by subscription, the entire cost of the new building whenever we may build. Is there not a brother or sister somewhere, a friend of the cause of Christ in the metropolis in America, who will give us a liberal contribution to this enterprise. Money placed here will bring splendid returns.

We were blessed on Lord's day, Nov. 12th, in having Bro. W. Durban, of London, England, preach at 169th Street in the morning; and in the evening Bro. E. H. Spring, of Gloucester, England, gave us a discourse. These brethren both are Englishmen and are pastors in their native land. They gave us good discourses, though quite dissimilar in thought, style and application. Each expressed himself as unfavorably impressed with the lack of Bibles in the services of our American congregations. In England the people always follow the minister in the reading and exposition of God's Word with open Bibles. Their rebuke is deserved; our people should make freer and fuller use of the living oracles in all our public church services. Bro. Durban gave us a splendid lecture on Monday eve the 13th, entitled "What an Engliahman Saw in Russia." He is a wide-awake, close observer and a most fascinating talker. We shall be glad to see him on his return to America.

The Delicate Woman

Simple and compact, this machine is more easily understood, its parts are better protected from dust, it has more room under the arm, and is capable of a greater range of work, than any similar device.

unable to operate the ordinary form of sewing-machine without fatigue, can use the SILENT SINGER AUTOMATIC with the greatest ease. The acme of perfection in construction and artistic finish, this machine is positively the lightest-running of any. Its low, broad treadle enables frequent change in position of the feet, or it can be furnished in a portable form to be effectively run by hand if desired. It has neither shuttle nor bobbin, and no tensions to adjust, but is ready for use when the needle is threaded.

The Silent Singer

has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by examination and comparison with similar machines.

Naming the Baby is a pleasant and agreeable task imposed on parents, but naming the disease, when symptoms seem to conflict according to laid down theories, has troubled many a doctor. Better let the name go, than to lose sight of the main principle—to remove the impurities in the blood—which is the source of nine-tenths of human ailments.

That is the theory and working principle of Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer. Therein lies its success. It is not a drug store medicine, but is sold to the people direct, or through local agents. For further particulars, write to Dr. Peter Fahrney, 112-114 So. Hoyne Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Our Work in Arkansas.

The Presbyterians claim in the state 5,000 members. The Episcopal Bishop tells me his people number 2,500, and that their domestic and foreign board will aid their missions in the state this year to the amount of $3,000. These two bodies announce officially that extra effort in the line of missionary state work will be put forth this year. The Baptists and Methodists each claim a membership of about 70,000, while we are supposed to have about half as many as this, 35,000. I tell them the Methodists were at work in the Southland about 85 years before us, there being just this difference between the birth of Wesley and Campbell respectively (1703 and 1788). As to the age of the Baptists we will have to suspend judgment and watch the issue between the Whitsitt idea of 1641 and the landmark chain of apostolic succession. The people about Pine Bluff wonder where our 35,000 can be, as I am the only preacher and our little band of Disciples here the only organization in this city or county.

It must be that quite a large part of our people in this state are in the country, and in the small towns, just as nearly all the Presbyterians and Episcopalians are in the cities and in the larger towns. What is wanted in Arkansas now is wisdom to develop our country and smaller town peoples and make them realize that we be brethren and that there should not only be no strike, but unity, cooperation and fellowship.

The same love of Christ that would have constrained Jewish and Gentile Christians to bear and forbear, and that if they can't work our way to work in their way for the conversion of the world, should obtain. Except among a very small element in Arkansas, who read that sectarian organ, the Firm Foundation, our people are one. This element is much larger in Texas, and they boast that they are not of us. Our progress here in Pine Bluff must necessarily be slow. At nearly every service some one says: "I never heard one of your people before."

It will take us several years to get out of debt and become self-sustaining. I think there is hope that some who after waiting long for a church here, went elsewhere, will return to their proper place. Bro. Browning is doing what he can, and has a Christlike forbearance towards all who can't yet see as he sees

Vice.

Vice that parades itself has lost the sense of shame. But the foulest vice hides beneath the fairest forms.

No sooner does virtue find a fair face for itself than vice steals it. Every young child repeats in its life the experience of Adam and Eve. Distillers and brewers, whose fortunes are built out of the tears and groans of the poor and crushed, are frequently the most liberal, gentlemanly and agreeable persons to meet. They need the fairest forms to cover the foulest life and the simple will reason from the agreeable presence of the person to the innocence of his harmful life. He poses calm with foul designs in the center of a vast extent of flimsy lines, while the more rigorous conduct of the truly good and righteous repels the ardor and hope of youth.

But punishable vice never parades itself, but compels it to draw the hat down over the eyes and to love darkness rather than light.

Counterfeiters and horsethieves do not show their trade upon our streets in vast parade as do saloonkeepers, but if they should be licensed to carry on their trade and liquor dealers should be deprived of license then the conditions would be reversed and horsethieves would parade with equestrian pomp and liquor dealers would be slinking bootleggers.

Public sentiment forced the liquor dealer to draw his hat over his eyes and to put up screens at his windows, but opposition to those who contend against the licensing system and their repeated defeat by saloonkeepers, thugs, politicians and preachers, has emboldened this class of evil-doers so they can put out their signs and parade their bad calling on the streets. Because of this vantage ground given to this class of vicious denizens other vices seek and find shelter under its legal folds.

The reason that liquor dealers are not elders and deacons in our churches, is because we have divorced civil conduct from our social and religious standards, so that while we can associate with them and even exalt them in our civil and political brotherhood, we have another rule for the church which makes our religion a subordinate and secondary affair to politics and partisan glory. So we put up screens to our doors against his church just as he puts up screens against us. But neither screens so closely but that a considerable exchange of familiarity can be kept up between the two institutions, for it is no harm for the Christian to vote for the saloonkeeper's trade nor for the church to accept the saloonkeeper's contributions to the funds for holy purposes.

What a Christian does in politics is nobody's business but his own, and it is an impertinence and insult for the church or the preacher to call into question on the Christian standards of good morals what a man does in the higher relations of politics where a "man's his own" and not answerable to the church nor to religion nor to its author—a place where no sumptuary regulations will be allowed—"begosh!"

You see this doctrine is older than the Christian Church, older than religion itself and was actually preached to Adam and Eve by the first politician, who came into the Garden of Eden, and commanded them not to submit to any sumptuary regulations, but just to eat and drink what you please. Nobody's business!

There is not any serious objection upon the part of the church to this order, considered as a civil and political affair, and Satan has no serious objection to the church's petty scruples about such matters so long as Christians do not try to carry their peculiar notions into civil affairs and harm his business.

But as a fountain cannot at the same time send forth water both sweet and bitter, neither can two standards of life and of morals exist together.

Abraham Lincoln opened the eyes of tens of thousands when he fully saw this fact (which Christ so clearly taught) and said the country cannot remain half free and half slave.

No amount of preaching or of prejudice could prevent amalgamation of the blacks and whites in the slave states, and it is perfectly absurd to suppose that the Christian Church can remain subordinate to politics and maintain a higher standard than the political parties in which its members are actors. As a matter of fact it does not do so only in sentiment, but not in discipline. So it has come to pass that not only is a positive, firm and pure Christian life become an obstacle to advancement in political parties, but vice has so far prevailed that such a man has to hide the very light which our God has told us to put upon a high place that all may see it.

The highest and truest life must disguise itself to get to the front. We must repent for doing good. Vice calls down virtue. The dishonesty and immorality in politics is also in the church. They will both come to one standard—which shall it be? J. S. HUGHES.

Texas Letter.

Texas is so large that it might almost be used as a synonymous term for "South." Richard H. Edmunds, in Harper's Weekly, has an interesting article on the growth of the South, and hence it comes very close to us. He shows how this region has steadily grown during the last twenty years until it is one of the most powerful portions of our land. Here are some of the figures:

"The wages paid to factory hands have increased from $75,900,000 in 1880 to $350,000,000 in 1899. In 1880 the South produced 431,000 bushels of grain. The crop for 1899 aggregated 736,600,000 bushels. Railroad mileage in 1880 was 20,600 miles, in 1899 it is 50,000. The Southern cotton mills in 1880 consumed 233,836 bales. In 1899 they consumed 1,399,000. The coal mined in that year was 6,000,000 tons, while in 1899 the total of 40,000,000 tons has been reached. The capital invested in cotton mills has increased from $21,900,000 in 1880 to $125,000 at the present time. From 397,000 tons of pig iron in 1880 the product has now grown to 2,500,000 tons. There is $40,000,000 in cotton seed oil manufacture now as against $3,500,000 in 1880. The capital invested in manufacturing to-day aggregates $1,000,000,000, while in 1880 it was only $257,000 000. The cotton crop has reached the aggregate of 11,275,000 bales. In 1880 it was only 5,750,000." All of this shows that a bright future is dawning upon us, and that at no distant day the center of population will come down into "Dixie."

The Lectureship of Texas, postponed on account of the exodus from here to the Jubilee Convention, convenes in the beautiful new church of Greenville Dec. 5-8. The program is a good one Some of the best even in the state are on for papers on important subjects. Besides these, that old Roman (Frenchman), Chas. Louis Loos, will be with us. This fact alone insures success. Send your name to D. W. Pritchett, and a good home, free, will be ready for you.

McLean and Rains never let up, and that is why the collections keep rolling up. The Jubilee Convention has hardly adjourned till they begin work for that $200,000 for Foreign Missions this year. They call this the Silver Jubilee Year. The society was organized in 1875. At that time we had no missions in foreign fields. Now we have them in India, China, Japan, Turkey, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, England, Africa and Cuba, and we will soon have one in the Philippines. These missions are cared for by 229 missionaries. These secretaries have inaugurated the Silver Jubilee League, with a membership fee of $25, which can be paid any time between now and Sept. 1, 1900, and which awards a beautiful diploma, a fit souvenir of the Silver Jubilee Year. Write them at Cincinnati for particulars and help them in this great work.

The Baptists of Texas are in the midst of their annual convention in this city at this writing, and they are having a stormy time of it. For several years they been divided into two factions, something like our "Progressives" and "Antis." The leader of their "Antis," one of their editors, has been denied a seat in the last three conventions, this one included. They gave him thirty minutes to defend himself, and had another man make a fifteen-minute speech in reply. Both speeches were full of fire and fury, so much so that the secular papers refused to publish them on account of the libel laws of the state. After these speeches it could hardly have been said of them, "Behold how beautiful it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" The day before, one of their big men, in a speech, quoted this doggerel:

"I'd rather be a Baptist,
And know that I am right,
Than to depend on water,
And be a Campbellite."

A fit response would be:

I'd rather be a "Campbellite,"
And know that I am right,
Than to be a Baptist,
And always in a fight.

But in spite of all this, they are a great people and are doing a great work.

Scoville and Huston are in a good meeting with us at the Central with 63 additions to date, and we think many more will follow. They are lovely spirits and good evangelists. Scoville is a fine preacher and a great exhorter. He loves God and man. He believes in prayer. I have never been in a meeting where there was half as much praying. But he believes in works, too, and I have never seen a more tireless worker. He loves the Bible and doesn't preach anything else. He is as free from egotism as any evangelist I ever saw. He does not preach self, but Christ. You do not see the preacher, but the cross. His humility is beautiful, and it is one of the strong elements of his power. Prof. Huston is equally efficient in the song service. He is full of enthusiasm, has a fine voice, and he not only leads, but he makes the people follow. He is an impressive soloist. At times while the invitation song is being sung he will sing a single stanza alone, and he does it with great effect. Besides all this he is a genial gentleman, a ceaseless worker and a superb cornetist. They make a strong team, and are doing much good. They have won the hearts of our people, and their prayers will follow them wherever God may call them. M. M. DAVIS.

A Jubilee Service at Galesburg.

The church at Galesburg has great reasons for rejoicing in the crowning work of its efforts to raise its church debt. Last Lord's day was the day set apart to raise the final sum necessary to wipe out the indebtedness of $3,750 on the church, and it was done. "For this work which we have done let us give God the praise," said the pastor, Elder C. H. White, "for he has made it possible for you to give to the work by abundantly supplying you with the good things of life, and its comforts."

For many years the church at Galesburg seemed to be struggling against great odds, and yet it has always been able to rise up and show that it has vitality, and it has never done so more completely than in this effort to free itself from debt.

The present pastor, C. H. White, whose picture appears herewith, has only been with the church since last April, but in that time he has shown has gneat energy and tact, and his willingness and capability for hard work. From a personal canvass of the membership of the church he has been able to get them to pull together, and the result of the united effort is surprising. None in the church would have believed it possible.

The sermon for the occasion was preached by the pastor and was on the text: "Forgetting the things that are behind, let us press forward." It was a fitting text and worthy of the occasion.

With this new departure, and with a new lease of life, it is hoped that the church may do even better work in the future than it has done in the past. It is one, if not the only one, of the churches in Galesburg that is out of debt, and the debt was raised in the right way, by the members going down into their pockets and giving it outright.

Dedication.

The new church at Dodge City, Kan., was dedicated Nov. 5th. The brethren in that city had been meeting in a little frame church for several years. E. M. Carr, who had been preaching at Piatt and Liberal, began work for half his time at Dodge City ear / last spring. He began to work for a new building. They had an apportunity to buy a stone business house that had never been finished, for $400, if I am not mistaken. They thereby had a chance to use their old church until the new one was completed. Adding to the material some lumber and stone they were enabled to put up the best church edifice in Western Kansas for $3,200. They raised $830 on dedication day and were enabled to meet all the demands but for the seats, which had not yet arrived. All the preachers of the city were present. The house was crowded as is usual on such occasions. The money was subscribed in less than thirty minutes. Communion services at 3:30 P. M. The building is 53x55 feet and is capable of seating 500 people. The roof is of shingles, the main part of the building is of sandstone, the gables are stone iron. Cathedral glass is used in the windows. The building will be seated with oak pews. The floor is raised, the baptistery is under the pulpit and the dressing rooms in the rear. The intention is to cut off part of house for a lecture room, but it is all one now. The building is a splendid structure and reflects credit on Dodge City workers and the liberality of the people.

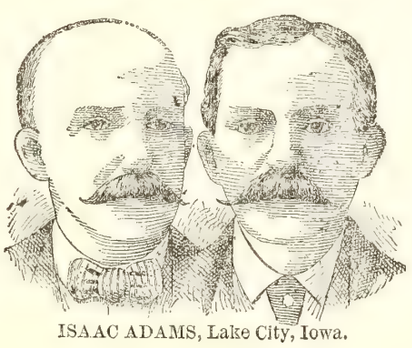
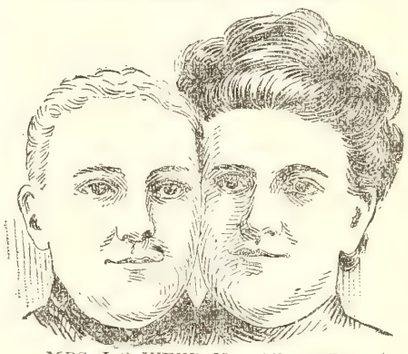
FREE CURE FOR BALDNESS

Trial Package of a Remarkable Remedy to Convince People it Actually Grows Hair.



Prevents Hair Falling Out, Removes Dandruff, Restores Prematurely Gray Hair to Natural Color, Stops Itching and Restores Luxuriant Growth to Eyebrows, Eyelashes and Shining Scalps.



MISS EMMA EMOND, Salem, Mass.

CHAS. W. BISHOP, Lathrop, Mich.

ISAAC ADAMS, Lake City, Iowa.

MRS. J. S. WEED, New Albany, Pa.

Those who are losing their hair or have parted with their locks can have it restored by a remedy that is sent free to all. A Cincinnati firm has concluded that the best way to convince people that hair can be grown on any head is to let them try it, and see for themselves. All sorts of theories have been advanced to account for falling hair, but after all, it is the remedy we are after and not the theory. People, who need more hair, or are anxious to save what they have or from sickness, dandruff or other causes have lost their hair should at once send their name and address to the Altenheim Medical Dispensary, 618 Butterfield Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and they will forward, prepaid by mail, a sufficient free trial package of their remedy to fully prove its remarkable action in quickly removing all traces of dandruff and scalp diseases and forcing a new growth of hair.

MISS EMMA EMOND.

The portraits of Miss Emma Emond show what a striking difference is made in a person when the bald head is covered with hair. Miss Emond was totally bald, the hair follicles not only upon her head but upon her eyebrows being completely contracted, not the sign of a hair being found. She sent for a free trial of the Foso Remedies and was rewarded by a growth of hair which for thickness, quality and luxuriance was as remarkable as the result was gratifying. Miss Emond lives in Salem, Mass., at 276 Washington St.

ISAAC H. ADAMS.

Isaac H. Adams, of Lake City, Iowa, is a conspicuous example of the fact that baldness can be cured. He says: "My hair came out so bad that I got bald all over the top of my head and the scalp got shiny. I used the Foso Treatment, and in forty-eight hours the remainder of my hair stopped falling out and in a few weeks I had as fine a growth of hair as any man would want." Mr. Adams sent his photographs to the proprietors of the Foso Remedies to show what are markable change had been produced.

MRS. J. S. WEED.

Mrs J. S. Weed, Treasurer of Swartz Corps No. 91, W. R. C., with headquarters at New Albany, Bradford Co., Pa., owes a luxurious growth of hair to the famous Foso Remedies, and although past fifty years of age, her hair grew out with astonishing luxuriance. Mrs. Weed kindly consented to permit her photographs to be sketched, one taken sometime ago when she was prematurely bald and a later one taken recently, showing the beautiful effects of this remarkable hair grower.

CHAS. W. BISHOP.

The experience of Chas. W. Bishop, of Lathrop, Mich, will doubtless encourage many another bald head to "go thou and do likewise." Mr. Bishop sent for a free trial of the Foso Remedy, and by diligent application has secured a fine growth of hair as shown in his portrait above. Mr. Bishop says: "Although I am 57 years old and had a shining crown for many years, I am glad to say that this wonderful remedy has made my hair grow out in a most remarkable manner. It began with a fine fuzz gradually getting stronger and thicker until I could comb and brush it as in the days of my youth. I can honestly recommend it to every one."

WRITE FOR FREE TRIAL.

The thousands of people who are bald or are losing their hair and think the condition incurable should send their name and address to the Altenheim Medical Dispensary, 618 Butterfield Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, for a free trial of this wonderful hair grower. It is not a patent medicine product, but the discovery of a well-known chemist and author, Prof. Stokes, on the subject of hair and its growth. It has had a most remarkable success and has fully settled the fact that hair can be made to grow on the baldest head, no matter what caused it to fall out or how many years the scalp has been shiny. Send for the free trial to-day and make a test of this truly marvelous hair grower. Send for it whether you have any faith or not. It will astonish you with its wonderful effect on the scalp.

Notes and News.

State Mission Notes.

We are beginning to hear some echoes from the field as to the State Mission collection. L. J. Marshall reports from Palmyra: "Had a fine day yesterday and raised $50." This is double their apportionment. Surely, such consecration on the part of the minister and liberality on the part of the church demand recognition. F. M. Rogers from Webb City reports: "Raised $20 for State Missions yesterday." This, again, is over three times their apportionment, and is all the more praiseworthy because they have not been in the habit of giving to missions. Bro. Rogers has been there but a little while, but he is doing a great work.

Bethany took her collection and sent it in. Bolivar has already raised and sent in more than last year, and says: "This is but the beginning. More to follow."

Then the word comes from a little church ministered to by Bro. J. L. Hollowell, of Queen City: "Took up our State Mission collection yesterday and raised $8, which find enclosed." This is double their apportionment. These are a few of the sounds that we have heard, and if we can only hear a few more of them we shall be ready to put in practice the resolutions of the convention.

Every day brings fresh evidence that the resolutions of the convention to put four strong evangelists in the field were wise ones. We are losing ground every day by not having them at work. We have the men. They are ready for the work; they are the men for the places. If there is any failure it will rest on the churches. You have been asked to give us your judgment. The moment we are assured that the money will be forthcoming we will place them in the field. Will you not ANSWER AT ONCE?

If you cannot take the collection at once, give us your promise of a definite amount to be sent at some future time. We are ready to make a forward move in this great work of ours if you will indicate that you want us to do it. There are strong indications that there is a deeper interest in State Missions than for years, and we are in strong hopes that we can tell you in a little while that these men have been placed.

Here is one of the "indications" of which we speak: The circular letter was sent to the correspondent of a certain church. I really did not know that it had been sent, because I knew the condition of the church. It is burdened with debt, it is making a great struggle for existence, it has barely escaped destruction several times, yet that correspondent out of his own pocket sends the full apportionment, with such cheerful words that it made one happy to receive it. We must have more of this spirit of sacrifice, or we shall lose OUR SUPREMACY in the state. Wherever I go I am asked: "How do we stand in relation to other religious bodies?" And I answer, "First." But I warn you that if the wonderful enthusiasm of our Baptist brethren keeps up we will wake up some morning and the news will strike us that our laurels are gone and another has taken our place.

WHAT THEN? Why, there is but one thing we can do, and that is to wake the very dead among us to the realization of the great need of earnest, enthusiastic work. Here is a call for help from EAST MOBERLY, with its 5,000 inhabitants, and not another Protestant church in it but ours. The Methodists and Baptists are ready to take up the work if we let it go. Shall we? What do you say? As Bro. Ely says, "Make your answer in dollars and cents."

REMEMBER, this month is our month, and we must push it for all it is possible. Will not the pastors and churches give this matter instant attention?

Important to Missouri Preachers.

I am just in receipt of a note of inquiry from Mr. C. M. Pratt, joint agent Southwestern Clergy Bureau, asking me how soon I can furnish him with the official list of Missouri preachers. I have replied that I will try and have it ready December 1. Are you sure your name is there? Are you sure your address is correct? This is important to you. In view of the especial value of this issue of the Missionary Magazine containing the above list to the ministry the state board ought not to bear the expense, hence we ask each minister in the state to send 25c. This means you if you have not sent it in. Attend to this matter at once. This is your last chance.

Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Famine in India.

Our missionaries in India report that the rains have failed this year, and that prices are nearly as high as they were two years ago. The starving people are flocking to the mission stations and asking for work and food. The missionaries have no money that they can use for their relief. The government is doing something, but there are many cases that it cannot reach. In Hurda there are thirty-five of our own people who are destitute. Unless aid is afforded them they will starve. The worst feature about the famine is that there is a lack of water, and this, it must be remembered, toward the close of the rainy season when wells and tanks should be brimming full. Unless rain falls in these areas, or unless the winter rains are very much heavier than usual, the condition of the country through the coming hot season may be more terrible than in recent years of food scarcity. The water famine will also materially interfere with the relief work, unless a deepening of the wells should prove successful in increasing the life-giving fluid.

This country was never so prosperous as it is now. Multitudes have more than they need. If they will open their hearts and purses and send some relief to the starving in India they will do a good work. Any contributions for this work may be sent to F. M. Rains, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio. Whatever is sent will be forwarded without delay. A. MCLEAN.

SLUGGISH INTELLECT

Caused By Coffee.

"Careful inquiry in the schoolroom developed the fact that those children who are habitually given coffee to drink have sallow complexion, are nervous, more or less irritable and very sluggish intellect or an overwrought and abnormal imagination, results of extreme nervousness. My own experience with coffee drinking kept me afflicted for some years with severe and constant headaches, with extreme nervousness at times.

"I was compelled to abandon coffee altogether and was quickly relieved of the headaches and other troubles. I was fortunate enough to secure a package of Postum Food Coffee, but my first attempt at making it was a failure. After another trial and following directions (which are very easy, by the way) I secured a delicious drink, far superior in my mind to coffee. I have continued to use it from the start and my improvement has been steady with no evil effects at all."

The above was written by a school-teacher, Miss E. Barnard, of Oxford, Kan.

It is an easy matter to leave off the coffee habit, if Postum Cereal Food Coffee is used in its place, particularly when attention is given to its proper preparation. The whole secret of the preparation is in allowing the Food Coffee to boil long enough to bring out the taste and food value.

All first-class grocers sell Postum.

A. M. Atkinson.

We all feel deeply the loss to the brotherhood occasioned by the death of our dear Bro. A. M. Atkinson. The circumstances immediately connected with his last words and work in the great convention and his sudden departure from us will be far-reaching, and while he rests from his labors his works will follow him. The memory of this faithful servant of the Master will be a real inspiration to grander efforts in the Lord's work to every one who knew him. I could not express my appreciation of the noble Christian manhood of our departed brother. Upon more than one occasion did he personally accommodate me in a very material way, which I greatly appreciated and shall never forget. His great, liberal heart was ever ready to aid and encourage his brethren in the ministry whenever it was possible for him to do so. Truly, a great one in our beloved Zion has fallen, and in sorrow we sympathize with the bereaved family in their great affliction. Yet, we rejoice in the thought that our loss is his eternal gain, and we shall join him in the higher and holier realm.

Special Evangelistic Effort.

Besides the work that has heretofore been done by the Ministerial Association of Eureka College, a new departure is to characterize its work in the future, which is briefly set forth below. The co-operation of the brotherhood is solicited to aid in furthering the work as it is outlined. All correspondence pertaining to the association or its work should be addressed to the secretary.

It is the purpose of the Ministerial Association to advance the interests of the Master's work—

(1) By co-operating with churches without pastoral care, and to supply them with preachers from the association members.

(2) By special evangelistic effort in building up churches that are not now able to do effective work, that they may become self-sustaining and fields of profit.

(3) By special missionary work in destitute and unexplored fields.

(4) All the work of bringing churchless preachers and preacherless churches together to be done through the medium of the association and its accredited officers, in co-operation with the state evangelist, the work being confined especially within reach of Eureka College.

The association and its plan of work comes forward with the following endorsers:

J. H. Hardin, President of Eureka College.
B. J. Radford, Dean of Bible Department.
N. S. Haynes, Pastor of Christian Church.
L. S. HARRINGTON, Secretary.

Eureka, Ill.

[Such a work as is outlined in the foregoing article, done in harmony with that of the state board, is certainly to be commended. It will not only strengthen the churches about Eureka, but be also a strength to the preacher students of Eureka College. It is certainly a mutual benefit movement.—EDITOR.]

KENTUCKY.

Georgetown, Nov. 15.—The great meeting here closed last night, after 24 days, with 165 added. Bro Dorris and the whole church did everything possible to make the meeting a success. I never saw a man more universally loved by his people than Bro. Dorris. Bro. Updyke's sermons were grand in their clear- ness and force. The interest increased with every service; 22 came forward the last day. We used the illustrated solos to good effect in the meeting. I have just had a very fine stereopticon made, for electric or oxy-hydro- gen light, the finest that could be procured in this country, and I am now better prepared than ever before for this work, which I have made my special line. I am glad that our city churches are appreciating the fact that this work is especially helpful to them. I next go to California, Mo.—C. E. MILLARD.

A LARGE TRIAL CASE FREE.

Rev. A. C. Darling, minister of the Gospel, under date of May 20th, writes from his home at North Constantia, Oswego county, New York:

I have been troubled with Kidney and kindred diseases for sixteen years, and tried all I could get without relief. Two and a half years ago I was taken with a severe attack of La Grippe, which turned to pneumonia. At that time my Liver, Kidney, Heart and Urinary Organs all combined in what to me seemed their last attack. My confi- dence in man and medicine had gone. My hope had vanished, and all that was left me was a dreary life and certain death. At last I heard of Alkavis, and as a last resort I commenc d taking it. At that time I was using the vessel as often as sixteen times in one night, without sleep or rest. In a short time to my astonishment, I could sleep all night as soundly as a baby, which I had not done in sixteen years before. What I know it has done for me I firmly believe it will do for all who will give Alkavis a fair trial. I most gladly recommend Alkavis to all. Sincerely yours, (Rev.) A. C. DARLING.

The venerable Mr. Joseph W. Whitten, of Wolf- boro, N. H., at eighty-five years of age, also testifies to the powers of Alkavis in curing severe Kidney and Bladder Disorders, Dropsy and Rheumatism. Hundreds of others give similar testimony. Many ladies also join in testifying to the wonderful curative powers of Alkavis in Kidney and allied diseases, and other troublesome afflictions peculiar to womanhood, which cannot with propriety be described here.

That you may judge of the value of this Great Discovery for yourself, we will send you one Large Case by mail Free, only asking that when cured yourself you will recommend it to others. It is a Sure Specific Cure and cannot fail. Address, The Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 403 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Nevada, Nov. 15.—Closed a very successful meeting here last night of four weeks' duration, with 24 added to the roll, and scores "re-enlisted" for active work. Bro. B. F. Hill, our efficient pastor, did the preaching and did it well. During this meeting some serious hindrances to our spiritual growth and development were removed and buried and pastor and congregation feel greatly encouraged. Our Bible-school has nearly doubled in the past 60 days, and signs of life and activity are notable all along the line, for all of which we thank the Lord and take courage.—A. E. FORDERHASE.

Sedalia, Nov. 14.—Bro. Putnam just closed a six weeks' meeting with 40 to 50 additions and the church very much strengthened. Most of those uniting were man and wife and Bro. Putnam baptizing them together was something we had never seen before. Bro. Putnam is growing in favor with our people every day. He is a young man of great promise. We are learning to love him more and more every day for his noble Christian character and pure life. We are delighted with his way of preaching Christ and him crucified.—D.

The Fading of the Year.

The time of fruitage passeth by,
The falling of the year;
And nature, decked in gorgeous dyes,
Betokens winter's near.

The days are short, the nights grow chill,
The touch of frost is here;
The katydid, with note so shrill,
Chirps to the fading year.

Soon will the snows of winter come,
And bleak December days;
But still a prayer of thankfulness
Let's not forget to raise.

Remember that, though seasons change,
Or friends may thoughtless be,
God changeth not—the God of love—
But reigns eternally.

Myra's Thanksgiving.

ORPHA BENNETT HOBLIT.

Two miles from a country town in cen-al Ohio lies a farm of two hundred and xty acres, known as the "Old Lowe lace." It is a typical Ohio farm. Be-des large fields of corn and smaller ains, there are pleasant wooded pastures, atered by a swift-running creek, and ider meadows open to the light of sun d sky. The rich, highly cultivated land well fenced; the farm is well stocked; e barns are large; the yards are cleanly pt and the spacious dwelling house, rched on a knoll near the center of the rm, overlooks at any season of the year a ene or beauty and prosperity both pleas-t and satisfying.

To one who loves nature, few things are ore interesting than the changes in a miliar landscape, due to the varying asons of the year. More grateful to the rmer himself, however, than any of the ys of early summer or of budding spring, tter than the full glory of the autumn or e white beauty of winter, is the season, lf of rest, half of expectation, that comes the late September or early October. en the harvest is over and barns and anaries are full to the eaves, and in e fields stand long lines of corn shocks, oking, at a distance, like Indian encamp-nts. The plow is turning the wheat ubble under. The goldenrod waves umphant in every fence corner. The ass has turned to a soft brown, the ods to a deeper and deeper green, with re and there a tinge of russet or scarlet, erunner of the change which is to me. A dreamy silence falls upon the th, lying bathed in the golden sun-ne—a silence broken only by the chirp the crickets or a bird-call from a far-off od—and the tender depths of the sky od lovingly over it all.

But, at the time of which I write, this ason was long past and November had ne, bringing with it clouded skies and uring rains. It was the 24th, the day fore Thanksgiving. Late in the after-on Myra Lowe went to her room and od at the window looking drearily out at gray sky and the sheets of falling rain. e was tired, having helped all day with preparations for to-morrow's dinner, l worse still, she was cross. Saddest of this combination of conditions was not h her at all unusual.

The Lowes with all their prosperity were not a happy family. The father and mother had spent their early married life in a bitter struggle against poverty, and the long years of toil had taken from their lives much brightness, leaving a hard, fault-finding man and a faded, querulous woman. There had been no time for affection, and although under the crusty exterior there was still a tender love for one another and for their children, it never found expression. The children, following their example, had grown to look at all manifestation of affectionate interest in one another as something ridiculous, to be replaced by half sneers and sharp criticisms, and to an outsider each would seem to be interested only in himself and in his own affairs.

Of course, such a state of things did not tend to produce happiness, and Myra's frequent fits of moodiness could easily be traced to this source. She knew well the cause of the trouble and realized that if she alone would drop her habit of scolding and fault-finding and voice some of the love and admiration that she really felt, matters would mend, but, dreading the ridicule which she feared would meet any advances, she had done nothing to make their family life more pleasant.

"I wish," she was thinking, as she stood flattening her pretty face against the pane, "I wish we were as nice and agreeable as other people are. There has been a continual fretting here ever since I can remember, and I believe it grows worse instead of better. I've no right to complain. I'm as bad as the others."

Here her thoughts were interrupted by her father's voice calling up the stairway.

"Myra," he said, "why don't you come and help your ma git supper on? She's most tuckered out. Seems like," he added, as Myra appeared at the top of the stairs, "seems like you children ain't ever on hand when you're wanted. Here's the black colt broke loose and got out in the cornfield and I've been a chasin' of him half the afternoon, and Bob a loafin' here in the house, never offerin' to help. He don't care how many steps I take—nor any of the rest of you, for that matter."

Myra, the state of her temper by no means improved by these words, ran past him without speaking, but Bob in the sitting room had heard his father's complaining.

"I didn't know the colt was loose, Dad," he said easily, for Bob's was a sunny nature, not lightly stirred to anger, "why didn't you come and tell me?"

"I ain't got no time to be runnin' round huntin' you," replied his father crossly. "If you'd only stay where you're needed sometimes, 'stid o' wastin' your time over that foolishness, we might git somethin' done."

"That foolishness" was a music rack which Bob was carving for Myra, a beautiful piece of work, of which he was justly proud.

"Supper's ready," said Myra, opening the door at this juncture. "Bob," she added sharply, "clear up that muss you've made. I declare, it pays to sweep this house!"

"Oh, bother the muss," said her brother. "I'm going to work at it again after supper. There's no sense in being so particular about things. Hullo, Ma, you've got pancakes. I thought I smelled 'em. Just give me sugared and buttered pancakes for supper and I'm satisfied every time."

Mrs. Lowe's tired face flushed with pleasure at this, but she said nothing, and the supper proceeded in the accustomed silence. Mr. Lowe's meal was soon finished and he rose to go to the barn.

"Pa," said Mrs. Lowe, hesitatingly, "can't you spare me a dollar or two? I want to send the hired man to town after supper to get a few little things if you can spare the money."

"I suppose I'll have to," said Mr. Lowe. "Here," and separating the silver from the bill in his purse, he handed it to her. "That leaves me without a cent of change."

Mrs. Lowe took the money without speaking. It was her husband's way of giving and she had almost grown accustomed to it, but Myra thought bitterly.

"Now why couldn't Pa have given her the money without that ugly speech? If he couldn't spare it, he might have said so, pleasantly, and she would have liked that better than if he had given her the bills as well as the silver. Oh, well, its no use thinking about such things."

"Ma," said Bob, helping himself to another pancake, "do you know what is the matter with the cakes to-night? You put too much soda in them."

"Oh, Bob," said Myra, impatiently, "don't be always finding fault. It is such a bad habit. If you keep on you will soon be as bad"—as the rest of us she meant to add, but Bob, feeling this to be the last straw, turned on her angrily:

"There you go. I'd like to know who finds more fault than you do. It's got so I can't say a word or do a thing in this house without having you all down on me. Nothing I do pleases Pa, and you are forever fretting and scolding if I make a move. I'm not going to try any more. I guess I can keep still if that's what you want. Catch me having anything to say to you after this, or to any one else when you are around."

"Oh, Bob," said Myra in dismay, "I didn't mean—"

"I don't care what you meant. Give me the money, Ma, I'll get your things for you. I guess I can find a place in town where people aren't forever nagging a fellow," and picking up his hat he left the room. Soon Myra heard the rapid splash of his horse's hoofs in the muddy lane and saw horse and rider disappearing in the gloom and mist toward the town.

"I don't like to have Bob go out in the rain with his cold," said Mrs. Lowe, going to the window and looking anxiously out. "It will be pitch dark before he gets back. I wish you hadn't scolded him, Myra."

"I didn't scold him," she said, defiantly. "He had no reason to get angry." Then in a more subdued voice, "Don't you think he will come home early?"

"Why, if he hadn't been so out of temper when he started he would, for he was anxious to get your rack done to-night. I don't know when he will come now. Well, it's no use to worry. Let's hurry with the dishes, for we have a lot to do yet before we are ready for to-morrow."

"I hate Thanksgiving dinners," said Myra bitterly. "We work hard every year to get up a fine dinner and invite everybody, just to make a show. There is never a word said about being thankful. We don't even have grace at the table unless the minister happens to be one of the company. It's all a sham. For my part, I think we have nothing to be thankful for."

"I know it's a lot of work," assented her mother. "But we've always done it and I suppose we always will. Your Pa would think the sky was fallin' if he didn't have turkey on Thanksgiving day. I guess we're as thankful as most folks, even if we don't have a blessin' asked."

"I don't care," said Myra, "I'm not one bit thankful this year, at any rate, and I don't mean to pretend that I am."

"Now don't be foolish," said her mother sharply, "just because you and Bob have had a fuss. It's not the first time, goodness knows." He'll get over it."

But Myra thought differently. It was true that they often quarreled, but their former "fusses" had never resulted so seriously. Usually Bob's anger lasted but a moment. He was the first to relent, showing that he was in good temper again by performing for her some little kindness —never speaking—for the great fellow, hungry as he might be for some word of love or forgiveness, would have been ashamed to ask for it. He had never before left her looking so angry, and her heart sank as she thought of his rash vow and the possibility of his keeping it. Suppose he never did speak to her again? Such things had happened. And she thought miserably how she would miss his cheery words and merry, teasing ways. Mingled with this thought was a fear for his safety, out in the wild night, mounted on a young horse that even daring Bob, in his ordinary moods, would scarcely have cared to ride.

She went listlessly about her work, and when it was finished sat down before the fire with her parents trying to busy herself with a piece of sewing. Her father read his paper and dozed alternately. Her mother sat patiently darning stockings. There was not a sound in the room except the ticking of the clock, the crackling of the fire and the beating of the rain against the windows. Nine o'clock came.

"It's an awful night Ma," said Myra. "Don't you think Bob ought to be at home?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Lowe, as she rolled up the last pair of neatly darned stockings. "I can't think what's keeping him. He didn't have much to see about in town. He'll surely be in pretty soon, but I'm so tired and sleepy I don't believe I'll wait up for him. You had better go to bed, too, Myra, for we must get up early to-morrow."

"Yes, go to bed," said Mr. Lowe, rising to wind the clock. "No use waiting up for Bob. Just leave the door unlocked and he'll get in all right."

"I'll go pretty soon," said Myra, and as her parents left the room, she replenished the fire and sat down to wait for her brother. Her work fell unheeded in her lap as she gave herself up to bitter and regretful thoughts. Tears rose to her eyes, but she dashed them away. "What's the use?" she muttered, "It can't be helped now. I wouldn't know how to ask him to forgive me, even if I felt that I ought to. He was more to blame than I and he might make the advances. I'll wait and see if he speaks to me when he comes in."

The clock struck ten and then eleven, but still Bob had not arrived. At last weary Myra, deciding that he meant to spend the night with some friend in town, locked the doors and went to bed.

She was awakened in the morning by her father's customary call at her door: "Myry, git up and help git breakfast."

Starting up and rubbing the sleep out of her eyes, she heard his heavy boots tramping down the passage, his vigorous knock at Bob's door and his exhortation to the supposed occupant to "be lively now, and git up and git the milkin' done."

"He doesn't know that Bob hasn't come," thought Myra, dressing herself rapidly. "Dear, dear! another dismal day! Won't it ever stop raining? But this won't keep the company at home. We'll have a houseful, just as usual, and the men will grumble about crops and the weather, and the women will talk of babies and cooking, and the children will race over the house, pulling things to pieces. A pretty way to keep Thanksgiving. However, it's as good as any, if one isn't thankful, a I'm not."

She ran down to the kitchen where h mother was already busied prepari breakfast, and by their united exertions was on the table as her father came from the barn.

"Ain't that boy through milkin'?" demanded.

"I don't believe he's up," said M Lowe. "I declare, I've been too busy think of callin' him."

"I'll git him down mighty quick," sa the farmer, wrathfully. "Here, you Bob he called up the stairway.

"He didn't come home last night, Pa said Myra, entering the room at t moment. "I sat up until eleven waiting him."

Didn't come home?" echoed her moth "What can have happened? He ne stays away at night without telling What horse did he take, Pa?"

"The colt," said Mr. Lowe, looki grave, "but don't worry, mother. Bo able to take care of himself anywhere. was a bad night and I suppose he st ayed town with Jim Brandt rather than ride the way out here in the dark and ra Let's have breakfast and I'll see to milkin' afterwards."

Mrs. Lowe said no more, but she still somewhat disturbed, while Myra undisguisedly anxious. She ate nothi but sat looking down the lane, listen eagerly for the sound of horse's hoofs. Bob came, and, breakfast over, she be to clear the table.

Outside the day grew more and m dreary. A mist descended, hiding f view the familiar objects in the y Looking a moment from the kitchen w dow, Myra saw a strange group of emerging from the fog, walking slowly bearing something that was covered with a cloth. In an instant she grasped the meaning of the sad procession and her heart stood still with horror. She heard the door open, heard her mother's agonized cry, her father's groan, heard the uneven tramp of feet as the men bore their sad burden into the bedroom, and there flashed suddenly upon her the consciousness that her tall, strong, loving-hearted brother, whom she had so often treated with unkindness, or at the best, indifference, was inexpressibly dear to her, and that he was lost to her forever. She tried to reach her mother, vaguely feeling that with her she might find some comfort, but the room swam round her, and for the first time in her young life she lost consciousness.

Waking, she found herself in her room with the motherly face of a kind neighbor bending over her.

"Poor child," said Mrs. Gray, "do you feel better now, dear?"

"What?" said Myra, vaguely struggling to rise. "Oh, I remember," and she buried her face in the pillow, weeping violently.

"There, there," said Mrs. Gray, smoothing her hair with tender hands, "it's dreadful, Myra, but you mustn't take on so. If you cry like this you will make yourself sick."

"I want to be sick," cried Myra, "I'd like to die. Oh, Mrs. Gray, I did it all."

"Did what? Nonsense, child. His horse threw him, and his head struck a stone by the roadside. My husband found him there this morning. What do you mean by saying such things?"

But Myra did not listen. "It was my fault, all my fault," she wailed.

"What is all your fault?"

In response to a vigorous shaking Myra woke and struggling up out of her chair, looked about her. It was night. The lamp was burning brightly, but the fire was nearly out and the room was cold. Bob, strong and well, stood before her, brushing the raindops from his coat and smiling at her amazed stare.

"Did you have the nightmare, Sis? I came in a moment ago and found you—"

"Oh, Bob, aren't you dead?" asked Myra, trying to collect her scattered wits.

How Bob laughed! "Well, no, not exactly. I think you are more dead than I am. Did you have a bad dream?"

"Yes, Bob," said Myra, putting her arms around his neck and kissing him to his great astonishment. He liked it, however, for, returning her caress, he sat down on the old sofa and pulling her down beside him, said gently:

"What was your dream, little sister? Did you think I had broken my neck?"

"I dreamed you had been killed, Bob. I'm sorry I scolded you this evening. You aren't angry now, are you?"

"No," said her brother, "it was more my fault than yours. I am ashamed of myself for acting so. But you are tired out and it is past twelve o'clock. You had better go to bed, Myra, and we'll have the dream for breakfast."

"It is Thanksgiving day," said Myra. Bob, I am thankful. I don't mean to be cross any more, if I can help it."

"Amen to that, Myra. I'll try to improve too. We'll help each other. Good-night."

Thanksgiving morning was bright and clear. During the day the house was overflowing with guests, but though there was the usual grumbling over crops and the trials of housekeeping, Myra carried through it all a thankful heart, and her bright face and cheery words gladdened the otherwise somewhat dreary festival.

And since that day a new order of things has reigned in the Lowe household, for Myra and Bob have bravely kept their promise through every temptation and provocation that has arisen.

November.

Where hath the summer fled? 'Tis but a day
Since her warm mantle lay upon the hill.
Her mellow song,
Like flute-tone sweet and long,
Still answered to the tarrying woodbird's trill.

But now the dying leaves drop stilly down
Through azure spaces to their lowly rest,
Or, wavering, lie
Afloat against the sky,
Till earth compels them to her wooing breast.

Where hath the summer fled? This way she passed,
Nor one reluctant look she backward cast.
I heard her sigh,
But never one good-bye
For you and me, who loved her to the last.

Here, while the glowing embers smoulder low,
From all the busy, troublous world apart,
Dear God above,
I pray that thy rich love
Make one perpetual summer in my heart.

Autumn Idyll.

John Perkins at his supper table remarked to his wife, "Mother, the barn's full o' punkins, the cribs are full of corn, potatoes are in the pit, cider in the barrel; guess I'll run into Louisville and see things." And he went. He dropped into a store and after making a few purchases the fresh clerk said, "Don't you want to buy a bicycle to ride around your town on? They're cheap now. Can give you a first-class one for $35." "I'd sooner put my $35 into a cow," said the countryman. "But think," said the clerk, "how foolish you would look riding around town on a cow." "Oh, I don't know," said the countryman, "no more foolish p'raps, than I would milking a bicycle.—Illustrated Kentuckian.

The Blessedness of Simple Toil.

There is a peculiar and intense happiness in simply working. The expenditure of energy in an occupation for which nature or training has endowed one with capacity means real pleasure. To this work one goes in the morning with eagerness and returns at evening with reluctance. There is no weariness in this work until it is finished, for the joy of the very doing sustains in strength. Task and talent are in tune and there is the happiness of harmony. But when task jars with talent there is discord and misery, or, at best, indifference.

The highest pleasure of an architect is to see the building rise in actual beauty as he has dreamed it in his blue-print plans. The greatest joy of the artist is the picturing forth of his heart's fancy on the canvas. The reward of any work for him who delights in it is not the compensation which the world pays whether in pounds and pennies or popular applause. His largest happiness comes from the very work itself. His greatest reward is more and better work. Indeed, no man who does the best work in the world does it for the money or the fame. The sublimated soul sinks these far below. Fortune may follow and the world's plaudits, but only as the incident, not the end.

And it is because of this the gripe of greed dwarfs the best men and women. The worker for a pitiful wage, the human machine employed at so much a day, can never accomplish so much nor be so truly happy as he who is free and stands upright and labors for the joy of the labor.—*Columbia (Mo.) Father and Mother in the "Old Churchyard."

T. H. BLENUS.

About two years ago the writer stood beside the open graves of his parents in the churchyard of St. John's Episcopal Church, Cornwallis, Nova Scotia. Our parents died within a few months of each other and were buried in the family lot in the cemetery known from our earliest recollections as the "Old Churchyard."

We laid them in the "Old Churchyard,"
While many friends stood near,
Whose hearts o'erswelled with deep regard,
For ones we loved so dear.

They're sleeping in the "Old Churchyard,"
In still and quiet rest,
Where locust trees are keeping ward,
Till heaven calls the blest.

They're sleeping in the "Old Churchyard,"
With no vain world's display,
They rest beneath the yielding sward,
And wait the glorious day.

They're sleeping in the "Old Churchyard,"
That dearest spot on earth,
With sighing pines, a stately guard,
So near our home of birth.

They're sleeping in the "Old Churchyard,"
Where scores of friends doth lie,
And may that calm rest ne'er be marred,
Till summoned up on high.

They're sleeping in the "Old Churchyard,"
After their toil and pain;
With life's deep sorrows all debarred,
This rest for them is gain.

The Curse of Idolatry.

[The folloing instance of self-torture clipped from one of our city papers well illustrates the curse of idolatry and the need for missions and missionaries.—EDITOR.]

BOMBAY, Nov. 9.—The unique penances inflicted upon themselves by Hindoo fakirs have been the subject of much comment by critics on Indian customs,. All sorts of odd punishments devised to mortify the flesh have been described, but the oddest is that devised by Almud Alli, an old Brahmin priest, residing near Okra.

This old fellow (he is over 73 years old) carries 800 pounds of heavy chains about him. They are suspended from his neck and waist, his wrists and ankles, and consists of every variety of chains from the small bracelet to the heavy ball and chain.

What is his idea in his unique affectation is unknown. Not a word will he say on the subject, except that it is ordained that he should wear them. Four years ago he simply followed the other usages of the Brahmin priests, but suddenly he conceived he his duty to wear the heavy weight about him, and since that time he has done so.

He is a preacher of the Hindoos for miles around. All of them go to him for spiritual advise and bring to him in payment for his comfort and prayers anything he demands of them. This is invariably the heavlest chain they can find.

It is in this way that he has collected his variety. At first he wore but one chain, but gradually he has been increasing his load until he now has the enormous weight about him. It prevents him from moving about without the most laborious effort. He drags the weight behind, but rarely goes without the hut in which he lives.

He can stand erect easily in spite of the weight suspended from his shoulders and waist. This is not greater than a hundred and fifty pounds. Each wrist bears a half hundred pounds. The remainder is all fastened to the ankles and only affect him when he walks.

Every hour of the day the chains remain upon him. They are all taken off at night. He sleeps on a hard board couch in which a groove is cut at the waist and neck. Into these the chains fit. The weight of them is then borne by the stomach and throat. The others, of course, rest on the boards and do not affect him.

The punishment would be devilish if it were not self-inflicted. As it is it is the most revolting outgrowth of religous fanaticism that is known of in India or anywhere.

The Father of the Man.

This anecdote of the boy who afterward became the famous Professor Henry Drummond shows his early quickness of mind:

Rev. James Robertson was holding a union Sunday-school service. The building was so crowded that some of the lads, including little Drummond, had to sit on the pulpit platform.

Mr. Robertson began his meeting by saying that the Bible is like a tree, each book a branch, each chapter a twig, each leaf a verse.

"My text is on the thirty-ninth branch, the third twig and the seventeenth leaf. Try and find it for me."

Almost immediately Henry slipped from behind him and said, "Malachi, third and seventeenth."

"Right, my boy; now take my place and read it out."

Then from the pulpit came the silvery voice: "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels."

Mr. Robertson laid his hand on the boy's head and said: "Well done. I hope one day you will be a minister."

The Red Box Clew—VIII.

The kitchen in the Clarmont home was extensive apartment. There was a col-ed woman who came to do the cooking, d who left after cleaning up; she always parted with a big basket, and nobody ew what was in the basket, nor dared in-stigate. There was a white girl who ne to clean up the rooms; very broad and ort she was, with slow, round eyes and oad, red hands that were constantly itching herself in various places where r clothes were loose. Her name was Lu-e. Her days were tormented by an ab-ce of buttons, and the presence of hair d shoestrings. Either her hair or shoe-ings were always trailing about. Some-nes one would be startled to discover Lu-e behind doors and in unfrequented nooks, ng something to her clothes. Besides ing that the colored cook did not carry ay the house in her basket, and that cile remained in her essential garments, housekeeper had the general sewing to

Her workroom was a delightfully at and shining apartment, every corner of suggesting activity. It was here that ank was put to work. She had never rned to sew, so it was only a pleasant ion that she should be of any assistance. t she learned fast, and Mrs. Dew did not ke her keep constantly at work. There re two hours in the morning and as many the afternoon when she could do as she ased. As Vega remained sullenly angry, ank was thrown upon her own resources. was natural for her to seek the brook. t somehow she did not enjoy herself out re; she was too lonely, and she was ubled to think of Vega's unhappiness. at could she do to conquer her enemy? st she wait a whole week for the deaf l to relent? Mrs. Dew said to her as returned from the meadow, "My dear, re is an old brown trunk in the attic; ppose you run up and see if you can find thing there to amuse yourself; you're lcome to all you find."

That sounded pleasant. So Frank ran to the attic, and she did not have to nt for the trunk, because she had noticed from the first. She sat down upon the or and opened the lid slowly and peeped

It was rather dark in that corner, but could see that the trunk was filled with oks and papers and magazines. You not know how eagerly Frank dived into heap of books, unless you remember t all her life she had been living in a si-t city house where there were no books Latin grammars and Latin readers—or tin something else. Of course, she had r schoolbooks, but I suppose there is no ller class of literature for vacation days an text-books. The only storybook she er owned was one about Rollo which her nday-school teacher had given her. Now she opened one book after another she w that the lines were broken up delight-ly all over the pages; and that meant nversation. And the magazines had pic-es and continued stories, and short ones, . Frank did not know what to choose. e laid down one to take up another. At t with a sigh of regret at leaving so any, she put three books that had the most conversation in them and four or five magazines under her arm; and she hurried down to the housekeeper's room with her booty. She was surprised when she opened the door to find Ronald with Mrs. Dew. He was all doubled up—as if he had been tied in a knot—in a big chair under a window, and his face was almost buried in his book. He looked at Frank in surprise, but dropped his head again and went on reading.

Mrs. Dew looked up from her sewing with her homelike smile. "Come in, dear. You needn't be surprised to find Ronald here; this is his retreat. But are you going to read all those books at once?"

Frank laughed as she placed them on the floor and seated herself beside them on a hassock. "I wish I could?" she said.

"Take a good book slow," said Mrs. Dew. "You see much finer country in a mover's wagon than you do from a car window."

Ronald groaned and said, "Mrs. Dew, I wish you and Bob wouldn't talk so much!" After that, silence was broken only by the turning of leaves and the rustle of goods, till Ronald himself spoke in a tone of disgust. "This is always the way! As soon as I get real interested, I strike a Latin sentence that I know just enough of to make it ridiculous! Mrs. Dew, you ought to have studied Latin so you could help me out!"

"What is the sentence?" inquired Frank.

"What you want to know for?" returned Ronald lazily. He read the sentence impressively, as if he had been a Catholic priest.

"Oh, I know what that means," said Frank, and she translated it. Ronald stared hard at her.

"How did you ever learn Latin?" he asked.

"Oh, I don't know it very well; I just happened to know that one," returned Frank, beginning to read again. But Ronald continued to stare at her in amazement.

"Hold on," he said; "don't get underway yet! I'd like to know how you could tell that verb was future. It looked like the subjunctive mood to me—or may be you don't know what I'm talking about."

"It might be subjunctive," replied Frank, "if it hadn't been a verb of the third conjugation. You know there isn't any 'b' in that future tense." She began to read again.

"But stop a minute," cried Ronald. "How can you tell what conjugation they're in? That's what gets me. I have to always tree their principal parts to find out."

"I don't know any way," said Frank, "except just to learn what conjugation each verb is in. As soon as you know which one a particular verb is in, you've got that verb fixed. Then you learn another verb, and another, and so on."

"But that would take a lifetime," Ronald groaned. "Do you know the verbs that way?"

"Nearly all of them."

"My!" exclaimed the boy. "And you making your living by your hands, with all that Latin in your head! Look a-here, Bob, what will you take to get some of that into my head?"

"I wish you would call me by my name," said Frank, laying down her book and looking earnestly at the boy. "If you knew how much that name means to me, you would. May I tell you about it?"

"Go ahead," Ronald answered.

"When—when I lost my parents, and didn't have anybody in the world to care for me, whether I lived or died, a dear old man and his sister took me to live with them. The sister was old, too—the prettiest white hair, and the softest eyes! I had no name, and the gentleman was bothered over what to call me. But the dear old lady sister said to call me Frank Douglas. And I will tell you why. It was because long, long years ago, when she was a beautiful young lady, she was engaged to such a handsome young man, with great brown eyes and he had a high forehead, and was ambitious and proud, in the good way of being proud. He was a soldier and he went to the war and was killed. And this sweetheart of his never ceased to love him, never at all. She longed to hear his name spoken again in the world, so she called me Frank Douglas, for that was his name. And I think whenever she heard my name called, and whenever she spoke it, she thought of him. She is dead now. And I know she would be sorry to have that name changed. It would look like everybody in the world had forgotten that brave soldier who loved her next to the cause he fought for. But that would be a mistake, for I think of him, often and often. I like to know that there is somebody to remember him, though he is a stranger to me. So please call me Frank Douglas, not so much because it is my name, as because it is his. Won't you, Ronald?"

"Of course, I will, Frank. Say, what'r you reading?"

"It's named 'Hearts Aflame,'" said Frank.

"Umh! Who wrote it?"

"Oh, I don't know; I didn't look. It's by—here it is; by 'Tiger.' It's splendid!"

"Umh! And what do you mean by splendid?"

"Why, interesting, of course; exciting."

"Now, look here, Frank, you've spoken for my good, and I'm going to speak for your good. You may know Latin, but I know a little about English. Whenever you see a book named 'Hearts Aflame,' you leave it alone, and just let it flame! What you must do is always to look first to see who is guilty of writing your book; and if you don't know the author to be first-class, you leave that book alone. Don't you think there are enough books by good men and women, but what you have to hunt up books written by Tigers? Now you spoke plain to me, and I'll return the compliment. That's fair, isn't it, Mrs. Dew? Tell us what your story's about, so far."

Frank flushed deeply. "It isn't nice to tell about," she said. "It's wives and things."

"See, what I told you!" cried Ronald.

"Yes," said Frank eagerly, "but it sounds nice the way 'Tiger' tells it; it sounds beautiful!"

"Does it make bad things nice for 'em to sound sweet? You let me pick out something fit for the kind of a girl I think you are. I'm going to call you Frank; you're going to read first-class books. Is it a go?"

THE DRUNKARD AND HIS MAKERS.*

This is intended to be a temperance lesson. Whether or not it shall be so will depend almost entirely upon the teacher. It is a somewhat difficult thing to find scriptural passages for the number of temperance lessons which are required for the seven years' course of the international series.

Moreover, it is impossible to find a paragraph of Scripture which precisely fits the situation which confronts the Christian worker of to-day in attempting to teach the evils of strong drink.

The Bible is a book of principles, not of rules, and the life of the present time is as different from that of the patriarchs or the time of Christ as two conditions of society could well be.

It is possible to illustrate the evils of strong drink upon the individual or society from the Scriptures. Noah's drunkenness and shame, Belshazzar's revelry, Herod's birthday debauch and its tragic ending, the drunken abominations of the Corinthians, are all illustrations of the power of strong drink to steal away men's brains and self-respect.

There are numerous instances of the power of self-control. The abstinence of Daniel and his friends, the Nazarite vow of Samuel, Samson and John the Baptist, the splendid example of the Rechabites, are all instructive. Then there are almost numberless admonitions to self-control, temperance and sobriety, with like numbers of warnings against the ruin of intemperance, ungoverned appitite and passion, scattered through th Old and New Testaments, notably in the Book of Proverbs and in the Epistles.

But the attempt to find in Scripture a passage that meets the situation at the present time upon the question of intemperance is as futile as to find there a reproof for the dance of modern society.

The temperance question of the Bible was chiefly an individual question; the question of temperance to-day is a social question.

In the days of the Old Testament and the New the drink habit was an individual matter; every man, especially in the earlier period of the national history, was his own winemaker and merchant. He used it as he used other articles of diet, and if in its use he ran into excess, squandered his patrimony and beggared his family, it was still a matter of restricted importance; he alone bore the responsibility.

No one was particularly the richer if he became a drunkard; no class of men fattened on his poverty; the saloon was yet a long way in the distance. There was no organization whose purpose it was to debauch the manhood of the nation through strong drink, and line its own purse at the expense of a drunkard constituency.

The nation looked upon drunkenness, not so much as a crime, but as a mark of a foolish man; it was the folly of a drunkard that the Proverbs held up to redicule. To-day the matter has largely changed front. The drink question is no longer a theme of individual interest; it is a social question, and must be approached from a social standpoint. It is possible to train the child in the habits of sobriety, and no effort should be spared in the home, the public school and the Sunday-school to accomplish this end.

It is possible to improve greatly the tone of public opinion and increase the sense of responsibility on the part of teachers and parents through the medium of the public press. It is possible by the power of moral suasion or of medical treatment to reclaim many from the drink habit and restore them to useful lives; but beyond all these one is confronted by the fact that the question of the drink habit is largely unsolved yet.

Its power is located very largely in the greed of men who are banded together, not to supply, simply, but to create the appetite for strong drink, and the forces of our social life become amazingly helpful to them in the furtherance of this diabolical purpose.

The Christian home sends out many young men, fortified with good principles to begin the career of life; but where there is one such young man there are probably a score whom the saloon can reach and master by its temptations.

The Sunday-school has the attention one hour in the week of multitudes of children and young people, and if the best use is made of the time, at least twice a year the question of temperance and personal sobriety may be brought to their attention by the teacher who is thoroughly consecrated to the responsible duties of his position. But the saloon is working night and day with appalling success to reach and overthrow the same class of young people.

The public school, where the teacher is faithful and competent, is able to give wholesome and scientific instruction upon the structure of the human system and the injurious effects of alcohol, but where one child is permanently reached by such influence a dozen will pass through it without effective results, while thousands never even receive this modicum of temperance instruction. Drunkards, now and then, are rescued in greater or lesser numbers, from the swift stream that is bearing them down toward the abyss. But where one is thus rescued by moral suasion or medical skill a hundred are plunged into the stream further up, by the power of the organized and relentless saloon. This whole question is a social and not an individual matter. It is no longer a question of the right of an individual to ruin himself and impoverish his family; it is the question whether society as a whole shall permit itself to be slowly poisoned to death by this league of money-loving, soul-destroying rumsellers.

It is the question whether the American home and the American child is worth as much as the spoils of office and the gratification of political ambitions. It is the question whether the individual honor, the domestic safety and the industrial prosperity of the country, all of which hinge upon the liquor question, are of more importance than the tariff on wool, the price of pig iron and the number of grains in a silver dollar.

When we are willing as a people to put into rigid political and economic practice the maxim that righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reprorch to any people, then we may expect to see a better day.

When we are willing to subordinate every material question to this one of paramount importance, then we may expect the reward of a national conscience in national health and prosperity. It is the duty of the Sunday-school and the pulpit to teach the duties of citizenship and social order. The Bible is a book of principles for nations as well as individuals, and this lesson should be taught, not alone from the necessarily limited range of its text in the Proverbs, but from ihe wider text-book of the whole Word of God, whose teachings upon the loss of national righteousness and conscience are so pointedly illustrated in the history of our own time on this question of temperance.

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 3.

"UNTIL HE COME"—THE LORD'S SUPPER.

How laage a part of what is most sacred and beautiful in the world is due to memory! The "dear dead days, beyond recall"—what do they hold for us of the sunshine of love, of the care of strong and tender hands? The tired nights when mother smoothed the covers down, the old corner in the church where a dear old Sunday-school teacher taught the first simple truths about religion, the sound of that old church bell, even the bare, hard-beaten spot beside the church door—all these things are full of memory and of tears.

How much dearer still must have been, to those who saw the Master in the flesh, the looks from his eyes, the tones of his voice, the strong touch of his hand when, in after years, they were bearing the burden and the heat of days of labor and persecution. Like the spring breath of youth came to them the memory of the time when, in irresponsible peace, they followed his heavily burdened steps. To think of him was now their greatest solace. Any wonder they kept this feast of remembrance, and pondered upon him?

And Paul, too, like one born out of due season, was admitted to that apostolic company, and to that circle of sacred memory. To all his converts, too, the same privilege was extended. They, also, could take part in this feast of memory and meditation. Then, in turn, to us comes the same opportunity to join in the company who remember and think upon him. All that is best in our budding religious life, all that is worth recalling of our most childlike trust in him ought to be brought up to our thought at these times. Great privilege to be admitted to this circle of remembrance! With open hearts let us welcome it.

But, says some one, isn't it all mystical symbolism, after all? What's the good of symbols? Let's have pure religious thought and feeling undefiled, without the touch of material and symbol. But all our life is bound up in symbolism. Even our words are symbols. Innumberable are the symbols used in commercial life. Shall we then not use them in religious life as well? God forbid that the time should ever come when any son should say "My mother knows I love her. Why should I make any demonstration of it?" and should go quietly along his way with no kiss for an old mother's brow, no tender word for a hungry heart. Symbolism? We cannot do without it! Let us have, then, the emblems of his broken body and shed blood.

Communion it has been called, and communion it is—an intimate mystical union of the heart with the heart of Christ. This is quite in keeping with Paul's teaching, who always insists upon such an intimate fellowship with Christ. We are to be "in Christ," and we are to have "Christ in us." Well may it be, then, if these emblems bring us into closer fellowship with Christ, that they should be called the communion.

Other names, Eucharist, Sacrament, whose meaning, even as the dictionary gives it, shows something of the meaning of this feast, have been employed.

The time of celebrating this feast, differing so much in different churches, is indicated for us very definitely in the New Testament, which tells how the disciples met together "on the first day of the week to break bread;" and in the words "as oft as ye do this, ye show forth my death till I come," inasmuch as we should remember his death as often as we can. The measure of opportunity, then, is the true measure of the observance of this feast.

THE C. E. READING COURSES.

A Model Conversion.

In Two Articles.

By F. D. Power, Director.

FIRST ARTICLE.

Thousands of people read the history of the Ethopian eunuch, and hundreds of preachers preach about it, and never think of it as eth simple story of the conversion of a human soul to Christ, a model given us by the Holy Spirit to teach how men were converted in apostolic times, how we must believe and obey, and how we are to labor for the conversion of others; and hosts of Bible readers would as soon think of going to Daniel or Malachi to learn what they must do to be saved, as of going to the eighth chapter of Acts, and following the example of this Ethiopian.

The Book of Acts is the Book of Conversions. Here we have the history of the conversion of thousands at one time and of single cases, delivered to us with the minutest details, and in the simplest, most unmistakable ianguage. In chapter 8:26-40 we have the story of ths turning of one man to Christ under the express direction of the Holy Spirit. This person is called a man of Ethiopia. Ethiopia was a great and powerful kingdom to the south of Egypt, and Candace was the name of several queens of the country mentioned by Strabo, Pliny and other historians. The eunuch was one of those men usually found about the persons of the great. He is chamberlain of the queen, first lord of the treasury, doubtless a man of great wealth, nobleness and influence. Best of all he was a pious man. Over two thousand miles of country he had traveled to worship in Jerusalem. Think of it when you complain of the long distance to the house of God. This one, anxious to learn, had journeyed from lower Egypt to Palestine, over a desert region for two thousand miles, thirsting for peace and truth. He is a Bible-reading traveler. Not often, in our day, do we see men or women with a Bible in their hands when on a journey. If you wish to be regarded us conspicuous and a trifle "cranky," take your Bible on the train or steamer and let men see you reading it. This man is devout and earnest, enquiring and honest, teachable and obedient.

Observe the actors in this conversion. First, God had a part in it. Great as God is, he has something to do in the salvation of every soul, however humble and far away out in the desert. He feels for and reaches out to the lowest, foulest and most wretched sinner. His hand builds worlds, yet lifts up and glorifies the weakest soul that trusts him. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who will have all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth." Having revealed the gospel with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven, having commissioned the apostles to bear the message to all nations, having given it in charge to the church for safekeeping and universal dissemination, and having provided his people with means and talents to carry forward this glorious work to the ends of the earth and to the ends of the ages, has not God given the highest possible assurance that it is the primary purpose of Christianity to save every man? "We preach Christ," says Paul, "warning every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. 1:28).

An angel has a part in this conversion. "The angel of the Lord spake unto Philip saying, "Arise and go toward the south unto the way that goeth down to Jerusalem to Gaza." Notice, the angel does not speak to the eunuch. While he is south of Jerusalem, traveling toward Gaza, the angel descends into the north into Samaria and appears unto Philip. Why does he not speak directly to the eunuch? Because God does not work that way. He grants to no man a special revelation, a miracle of grace apart from the gospel. He works through agents, through men. He may have some great purpose in this man's conversion, for he calls the preacher from the city where he is reaching thousands and sends him after this one man, but he works no miracle to reach the eunuch. He proposes this conversion and institutes every step that leads to it, simply, naturally. The angel is sent, not to the eunuch, but to Philip. The Son of God operates through men. The apostles were commanded to go into all the world and preach the gospel t every creature. To men it is permitted to do greater things than the Son of God since the gospel is intrusted to them, and the glorious work of proclaiming it to all men. To the church it is given to do grander things than the angels, when God lays upon her the responsibility of souls, and the duty of calling upon earth's millions to be reconciled to God. Here a man is worth more than an angel. The best that the angel can do is to come as a messenger from God to tell the man to arise and go. Happy is the man who will always heed the promptings of such messages.

Again, the Holy Spirit has a part in bringing the eunuch to Christ. "Then the Spirit said unto Philip, "Go near and join thyself to this chariot." Philip had obeyed the angel and reached the place appointed and a man of Ethiopia appeared before him, sitting in his chariot, reading the Scriptures. The Spirit now directs him. The Spirit, like the angel, deals immediately, not with the hearer, but with the preacher. Men do not receive special revelations, independent of the gospel, to bring them to Christ. God does not multiply miracles needlessly. Special revelations of the Spirit were necessary in that day and were made to the apostles, to the church, but the Spirit always spoke to the world through some human agency. Hence the command, "Go join thyself to this chariot;" hence when the question is asked, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" the eunuch answers, "How can I except some man should guide me?" The Spirit directed the preacher. The Spirit inspired the prophet. The Spirit spake through Isaiah and Philip instructing the sinner what to do to be saved and comforting him and promoting his joy after he had obeyed. The Spirit operated through the Word, which is the sword of the Spirit, convicted of sin and comforted the obedient soul. Hence the imperative obligation: "Preach the Word." God uses men, uses us, that through human instruments the glorious gospel may be borne to the ends of the earth. Your work is higher than the work of angels. Millions are calling to you for the bread of life. Shall you rest idly, be content with the work already done, or go into the deserts and join yourself to the chariots of men, and everywhere, in every way, to every one, preach the Word?

THE ART OF LIVING ALONE. By Amory H. Bradford. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York. Price, 50 cents.

This little book was written by a busy pastor and is concerned with the practical affairs of life. Its style is simple, easy and direct. It is instructive, encouraging and illuminating. It is free from that cant and over-piousness so characteristic of books of devotion. Its message bears directly upon the duties of life. Its aim is to show how loneliness may be beneficial and how we may make the best of solitude.

In the chapter on "Compensations of Solitude" he shows how loneliness may inspire sympathy with one's fellowmen and lead us to companionship with the unseen Father. It has a deep religious basis, but it is not unduly mystical. In this chapter he says: "The sense of fellowship with God is for all who love their fellowmen, who trust their Heavenly Father and who keep their hearts pure and their minds clean." Emphasis is placed upon the inwardness of religion. He suggests a few books which may become permanent companions to cheer and entertain and comfort us in hours when alone. He says the New Testament is the most optimistic book ever written. It is keyed to the note of victory. Among the helps for hours of devotion, Phillips Brooks' sermons and Beecher's "Star Papers" are mentioned.

The chapter on the "Renewed Mind" is one of the most helpful. The art of living consists in finding such a philosophy and living in such a spirit as to be able to make the most of one's self in whatever state, and to be of most service in the world; and this little book certainly throws light on this problem of living. It is invigorating and to be most highly commended. Christian Endeavorers who are keeping the Quiet Hour will find it of value and those who live much alone will find a message to the heart.

A companion volume, "The Art of Living Together," by R. F. Horton, is of equal merit.

THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT. By Hamilton Wright Mabie. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York. Price, $1.25.

This is a collection of short essays, some of which appeared in the Outlook. Mr. Mabie is well known as an essayist and a man of fine literary attainments. His style has an ease, a charm, a beauty of imagery and diction which always attracts and entertains. He has a keen intuitive insight into the significance of religious truth and the workings of God in the human heart.

In this book the writer deals with the soul's experiences; and his purpose is to interpret them in such a way that we may learn how to walk after the instincts of the spiritual nature. He deals with such problems as confront this busy, hurried 19th century. He knows the thought of his time—which way the currents flow. He considers, for example, Some Sources of Pessimism, Character and Fate, Love of Country, In Troubled Times. Then again, knowing the strain and heavy work of our day, he considers such subjects as The Sorrow of Knowledge, The Pain of Limitation, The Imperfect Life, indicating how, through these very struggles, we come into the possession of ourselves and enter into the true life of the Spirit. But it is not a subjective book, nor one for the cloister. It takes you out of doors and gives you subjects like The Companionship of the Sky, The Hills of God, The Sea is His, Health and Courage, Religion out of Doors. Religion includes all of life. The unseen Spirit permeates all life, and this book shows an effort to live, not only above chance and change and environment, but to use them in the advancement of the higher life of mind and soul. It is the true conception of religion. The author interprets religious truth in the light of modern thought. He makes truth, therefore, vital and universal. As a book of religious instruction it is a valuable contribution. He sounds the true conception of Christ's religion in such statements as these subjects indicate: Not Renunciation, but Co-operation, The Soul of Goodness is Love, The Retreats of the Spirit, The Ideal in the Actual, Prophecies of Easter. It is a book of comfort and carries one's life out of limitations and places it in harmony with universal truth and the will of him who is over all. It bears a likeness to Isaiah chapters, 40 to 66, not only from its beautiful and magnificent literary quality, but that it comes with the message of that prophet: "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people." The book is prophetic, for it unveils the most delicate feelings of the human heart. He touches lightly and suggestively the most profound truths, and with a delicacy and grace he unveils the most inward experiences through which the individual and the nation are now passing.

QUAINT CORNERS OF ANCIENT EMPIRES: Southern India, Burmah and Manila. By Michael Meyers Shoemaker. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London.

The reader who loves to follow an observant traveler through quaint and seldom visited corners of the world will be delighted with this volume. The author has a happy way of taking his readers along with him and showing them the sights and scenes which have attracted him to these places. The chief interest in this volume, however, at the present time centers in the author's description of Manila and the religious, political and social condition of the people of the Philippine Islands. The author's account of the friars—their corrupt lives and the manner in which they have oppressed the people of the islands—should receive special attention by those who are interested in the Christianization and elevation of the people of those islands. There is much here to explain the deep feeling of hostility on the part of the insurgents towards these religious orders and to the United States, which, at present, as it seems to the native population, has taken the place of Spain as the protector of these orders against the interests of the people. It will require a wise and discriminating statesmanship to deal with this difficult and delicate problem. While the whole book is full of interest, the latter chapters are of special interest in view of the fact that these islands have recently come into the possession of our government. Some things which have appeared in the public press of late, from Archbishop Chappelle and other Catholic dignitaries, are sufficient to excite the fear that the Roman Catholics of this country will be disposed to avail themselves of the ill-gotten gains of these corrupt friars, whose lechery and cupidity have brought the very name of religion into disgrace in these islands. We commend this book to all who would know the religious situation in the Philippines.

THE GREAT APPEAL. By James G. McClure, president Lake Forest University, Chicago, New York, Toronto. Fleming H. Revell Co., 1899.

The value of a book is not to be measured by its size any more than a man is to be so measured. This is a small volume of 131 pages, but it is as full of meat as an egg. The seven chapters are on the following topics: 1. The Appeal to the Intellect; 2. The Appeal to the Heart; 3. The Appeal to the Conscience; 4. The Appeal to the Memory; 5. The Appeal to the Imagination; 6. The Appeal to Self Interests; 7. The Appeal to the Will. Each one of these topics is treated in a clear and forcible way that carries conviction to the reader. We should think every evangelist, as well as every pastor, would like to study such a book, showing God's appeal to the different parts of our human nature, that he might understand better, if possible, the mighty motives which God uses to win the sinner unto reconciliation with Himself. We commend the book to all who would be winners of souls.

DRENNER.

George Washington Drenner was born in Washington County, Maryland, Feb. 22, 1833. Accompanied his parents to Ogle County, Illinois in 1859, where he resided till his death, November 7, 1899, at Stratford, in Pine Creek Township. He was married twice; his first wife, Melinda Hagar Drenner, died in 1874, leaving 12 children, among whom are three pairs of twins. Eleven of these children are living, all of whom are married but one, and all have been baptized but one, and all were present at their father's funeral, though scattered far and near. His second wife, Sarah Parks Drenner, survives to mourn the loss of a true companion. Three children were born of this union, all of whom have passed on before. Bro. Drenner was baptized by Eld. Chas. Sherwood, and is recorded as one of the charter members of the Pine Creek Church of Christ, June 19, 1859, which church he served in various capacities as Sunday-school superintendent, church treasurer, chorister, deacon and elder, serving as latter at the time of his death, and as such was generous to a fault. As a Christian he was faithful, forgiving and fruitful. As a citizen he was honest, peaceful and patriotic. His life was as sunny as the day on which the throng of friends and neighbors surrounded his grave to pay tribute to his memory, Nov. 9, 1899. The writer was called to preach the funeral sermon. D. F. SEYSTER.

Lynnsville, Ill., Nov. 14, 1899.

DUCKWORTH.

Mrs. Victoria Duckworth, of near Maryville, Mo, on Aug. 27, 1899, bade farewell to the loved ones here and with strong faith in the divine love entered into the joys of the better world. A husband and nine children mourn for one who was cheerful and kind and a pleasant companion always. The home is sad without her, but the Christ who wept with such sorrow as theirs is able to comfort and sustain them, and we who knew and loved her mingle our hopes with theirs that we may meet her "OVER THERE."

McREYNOLDS.

On Thursday morning, Oct. 26, 1899, Mrs. Rachel F. McReynolds, wife of John W. McReynolds, of Lincoln, Kan., quietly fell asleep in Jesus. She was surrounded by her own family in her own home. Her funeral services were conducted at the house by Revs. J. M. Brunt and H. C. Bradbury. Bro. M. P. King conducted the music. The 23rd Psalm, her favorite, was sung and repeated. The 15th chapter of 1 Corinthians was read and part of the 8th chapter of Romans. Revelation 14:13 was chosen as the text: "And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." Her dearest friends and neighbors were present, and went to the grave, nine miles southeast of Lincoln in the Hammer Cemetery, the family burying ground. No one can tell how much she is missed at home. She was a true mother and wife. God had given her 13 children, eight of whom are now living, and were present to hear their mother's parting words of counsel. These will never be forgotten. God seemed to give her strength to speak—she spoke as if inspired Dr. Hunter, who was present, said that she filled with joy when he told her that soon she must die. She was more than conqueror through him that loved us. Death had no sting. Her great anxiety then was for the souls of others, forgetful of her own bodily pain. She was born on the 5th of October, 1838, in Montgomery county, Ind. Her maiden name was Quillin. She afterwards removed to Monroe county, Ia., where on Sept. 24, 1855, she was married to Bro. McReynolds, who was then a young school teacher in a neighboring district. (Fourteen years of his life have been devoted to school-teaching.) Seven months later she became a member of the Church of Christ. For four years they lived in Ringgold county, Ia. They then moved to Marion county, Ia., where they lived for ten years. Here she started a little Sabbath school in her own house. Others came and entered into her work, and now we see two churches that have grown out of this little seed. In 1873 the family moved to Saline county, Kan., and in 1876 to Tower Springs, Lincoln county, Kan., where she was distinguished by her faithful, loving home life. She rejoiced to see all her children members of the Church of Christ. She was a kind neighbor. "You can't say too much good about Sister McReynolds," said one of her old neighbors. "She cared for me when I was sick. I shall never forget her," said another. So as one goes from house to house he hears something good and kind about her. When a minister of a sister denomination preached at Tower Springs he always found a cheerful welcome at the McReynolds home. It seemed as if he was among his own brothers and sisters in Christ. Five years ago the family moved from the farm to Lincoln, Kan., when Bro. McReynolds was chosen treasurer of Lincoln county. Here she was not seen often in public on account of her being a partial invalid. But her motherly presence at home made it so homelike that it is very hard to have her go. But to depart is far better for her, for Paul tells us, "I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us" (Rom. 8:18). "For we know that if our earthy house of this tabernacle were dissolved we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor. 5:1). A poem, appropriate for such a life, was read in connection with the funeral sermon. H. C. BRADBURY.

PARMLEY.

On the 3d of November a life full of usefulness closed its work, when the spirit of Fannie, wife of O. A. Parmley, went into the perfect rest that awaits the true soldier of the cross. A husband and two little ones, an aged mother and a host of friends and relatives mourn for one whose Christian example was uplifting, whose friendship was of the kind that stops at no sacrifice, whose nature was full of tender thoughtfulness and loving deeds. She was born in Hebron, Ill., in 1859. In 1883 she was married in Hebron, Neb., to O. A. Parmley. During the same year she united with the Christian Church, and in the intervening years she has done more for the cause of Christ and the church than many a one does in a lifetime. Since 1890 her home has been in Ogden, Utah. Blessed with ample worldly means, she was never known to refuse a call, but rather to seek those who needed help. Never very strong physically, she yet was untiring in every phase of religious work. In a field where our workers are but few, where all are taxed heavily and courage often runs low, such a one can be but poorly spared; yet our faith rests in One who doeth all things well, and even in our tears and our loneliness we see the Father's hand and recognize his goodness, for "we know in whom we have believed."

"He giveth his beloved sleep."
He loved thee well and gave thee rest.
"He taketh to himself his own,"
And so took thee. He knoweth best!

SAUNDERS.

I was summoned to Omaha last week to preach the funeral of ex-Governor Alvin Saunders, who departed this life Wednesday, Nov. 1, 1899. Bro. Saunders was born the year of our Lord 1817, in Fleming County, Ky. He was appointed governor of Nebraska by Abraham Lincoln and held the position for two terms. He served a term in the Iowa State Senate, and was chosen by Nebraska to represent her in the Senate of the United States. The greater part of his years were spent in public life, and his record as a public official was as white as snow. The same is true of his private and church life. When but a youth he united with the Christian Church and lived a consistent member of the same until the Lord called him to a higher and a more blessed service. His death was as tranquil and beautiful as his life had been pure and useful. Sister Saunders, with her two children, Charles and Mrs. Russell P. Harrison, feel deeply the great loss they have sustained, but are grateful that the dear Father gave them such a noble father and husband for so many years. The world holds few women more beautiful and accomplished than Mrs. Harrison. Bro. Saunders became somewhat involved financially, having lost heavily during the boom in the West, but with wonderful business sagacity and a noble purpose he lived to pay every cent of this indebtedness, and left behind a beautiful home and a large amount of property. The writer conducted the funeral services, which were held in the elegant family home. A large company of sympathizing friends were present; many from other states came so show their respect for the dead and their sympathy for the living. We laid him to rest in Wood Lawn Cemetery beneath a mountain of beautiful flowers. J. W. INGRAM.

WARD.

Louis A. Ward departed this life November 7, at the age of 17 years, after an illness of several months. Early in life he became a Christian and remained faithful to the end. All that kind friends and medical skill could do was done, which only served to alleviate the suffering and soothe the fevered brow. His remains were laid away in the Harvard Cemetery to await the glorious resurrection of the just. His funeral was conducted by the writer.

Winter in the South.

The season approaches when one's thoughts turn toward a place where the inconveniences of a Northern winter may be escaped. No section of this country offers such ideal spots as the Gulf Coast on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad between Mobile and New Orleans. It possesses a mild climate, pure air, even temperature and facilities for hunting and fishing enjoyed by no other section. Accommodations for visitors are first-class, and can be secured at moderate prices. The L. & N. R. R. is the only line by which it can be reached in through cars from Northern cities. Through cars schedules to all points in Florida by this line are also perfect. Write for folders, etc., to GEO. B. HORNER, D. P. A., St. Louis, Mo.

Publishers' Notes.

A LARGE AMOUNT.

The Advance, the leading Congregational paper, published at Chicago, Ill., says in a recent issue: "The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900 contains a large amount of suggestive matter in the Sunday-school lessons." The active Sunday-school worker that desires a work that covers all phases of the lessons should procure the Christian Lesson Commentary, prepared by W. W. Dowling and published by the Christian Publishing Co., of St. Louis, Mo. It is a book of about 400 pages, neat cloth binding, and the price is $1.00 per copy, or $9.00 per dozen.

SUITABLE FOR ALL GRADES.

The series of Sunday-school literature prepared by W. W. Dowling and published by the Christian Publishing Co., is adapted for use by all grades in the Sunday-school of to-day. We want you to see what we publish and to make a close examination of its merits. Send to us for samples and we will mail you a complete set of samples representing the most extensive line of Sunday-school supplies now offered to our people. See our literature before placing your order for Sunday-school supplies for the coming year. Address Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

A NEW BOOK ON AN OLD SUBJECT.

"Moses, the Man of God," written by the well-known author, Dr. D. R. Dungan, is just from the press of the Christian Publishing Co. The book contains sixteen chapters, 303 pages and is bound in latest style cloth binding. This work is a valuable addition to the list of books on prominent Bible characters which have been published by the Christian Publishing Co. during the last twelve months. The following extract from the introduction, written by the author, will give an idea of the contents of the book: "Moses had a great nature and had a wonderful work to perform. When his whole life is before us, with all its temptations, duties and dangers, it is astonishingly free from weakness and blunder. Let us with patience follow this most wonderful of the sons of men. In the Bible we have the life of Moses so interwoven with the affairs of Israel that we scarcely get a good view of the man himself. It is our aim, therefore, in this work to bring out the man Moses that we may get acquainted with the leader and lawgiver of the Jews." This book is printed in clear type on good paper and the price is $1.00 per copy, postpaid.

ADDRESS, CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING CO.,
1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

Good literature is a necessity in every well-regulated family. "Man shall not live by bread alone."

"Oh, we have so much reading matter!" But what kind is it? If the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST is not included, now is the time to correct your error.

We are sending, postpaid, an American Revised Reference Bible, French Morocco, Divinity Circuit, red under gold edges, etc., with one year's subscription to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for only $3.25, but we are not urging it. We are not liable to become rich through such an offer.

With such a paper as we are furnishing it ought to be no difficult matter to double its circulation this year. It is only necessary for each subscriber to send one new name. Surely, that is easily done. We are naturally encouraged by the flood of congratulatory and cheering letters which have poured in upon us, and it may be that our estimate of doubling our list is too small. It all depends upon showing our faith by our works. Active, hearty support in each community is what we want. Shall we have it?

Our offer of Secretary McLean's superb book, A Circuit of the Globe, with one year's subscription to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for two dollars and fifty cents is far out of the ordinary. The book is well worth its price, two dollars. We know that you will be delighted with your bargain, and therefore guarantee satisfaction. Your money will be returned if you are not pleased.

Is there any one actively engaged in enlarging our list of subscribers in your community? If not, kindly show your interest by writing to this department about it. Your church cannot afford to be negligent in this matter. You can scarcely hope to keep up to date without reading the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Subscribers who received a copy of T. W. Grafton's Life of Alexander Campbell last year will doubtless want the companion book by the same author and entitled Men of Yesterday. We sell it for one dollar. We give you the book and one year's subscription to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for two dollars. Speak quickly.

Our Thanksgiving number appears next week. If you want a sample copy of it sent to a friend whom you will try to secure as a regular subscriber, send us the address at once. The striking cover, the splendid contents and our editor's prospectus of next year's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will combine to make it a valuable number.

All letters of information, advice or suggestion concerning the enlargement of the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST should be addressed to and will be appreciated by the manager of this department.

CHRISTIAN - EVANGELIST

What We Plead For

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

For the right against the wrong;
For the weak against the strong;
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.
For the truth, 'gainst superstition.
For the faith, against tradition,
For the hope, whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

FREQUENCY OF THE LORD'S SUPPER

By N. J. AYLSWORTH, A. M.

9 Chapters, 103 Pages, Paper Binding,..... 25 Cents.

The Author in this book considers the Lord's Supper with reference to its nature an uses, or the book is a study of the law of repetition in its relation to public worship. careful reading of this book will tend to deepen one's conviction that the Lord's Suppe should be celebrated frequently and regularly.

After a careful reading of this book J. S. Lamar says: "I have read N. J. Aylsworth' 'Frequency of the Lord's Supper' with sincere pleasure, unqualified approbation an great spiritual profit. I heartily commend it to ministers, elders and all earnest Chris tians whose hearts are reaching after the best things in our holy religion."

The nine chapters in the book are as follows: Spiritual Uses of the Lord's Suppe (2 chapters), Does Frequent Repetition Decrease the Usefulness of the Lord's Supper? Two Distinctive Characteristics of the Lord's Supper, Some Conditions of the Conserva tion of Spiritual Interest, Relation of the Lord's Supper to the Sunday Morning Sermon Relation of Works to Spiritual Interest, Augmenting Effectiveness by Frequent Repeti tion, Progressive Enrichment by Association.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The events of the week in South Africa are the continued southward advance of the Boers in Natal, cutting off Estcourt and Mooi River from their base of supplies on the coast; the arrival of several troop ships at Durban with infantry, but with none of the artillery and cavalry which are necessary for the relief of the beleaguered towns, and a victory at Belmont for the British relief expedition which is proceeding toward Kimberley under the command of Gen. Methuen. The victory was decisive and important, but it cost the British 240 killed and wounded. The Free Staters are thereby swept out of the path and the road to Kimberley left comparatively open. Later dispatches report that Gen. Methuen himself has been wounded. Aside from this one successful encounter at Belmont, nothing has occurred to make the British outlook brighter. The Boers have now cut off five towns: Mafeking, on the western border of the Transvaal; Kimberley, on the western edge of the Orange Free State, and Ladysmith, Estcourt and Mooi River in Natal. It is the hope of British sympathizers, and not without some reasonable basis, that by attempting to besiege so many places at once the Boers will divide their forces and will ultimately be beaten in detail.

Late dispatches from the Philippines indicate that the results of the campaign in the northern part of Luzon were more significant than was at first supposed. It is true that Aguinaldo slipped away when he was almost cornered, but his army and his congress have gone to pieces with a degree of completeness which has never before been even remotely approximated. The insurgent forces are scattered among the mountains, and many of the members of the congress are making their peace with the United States. It is the opinion even among the more sober of the anti-expansionist journals that organized resistance to United States sovereignty in Luzon is about at an end. This is not to say that there is not a good deal of fighting still to be done, for no one can tell how long isolated chiefs at the head of insurgent bands may hide in the mountains and resist American authority. Making all due allowance for enthusiasm, overstatement and error in details, it is a safe proposition that the prospects to day for a speedy termination of hostilities in the Philippines are much brighter than they have ever been before.

Gen. Kitchener's campaign in the Soudan has reached a sudden consummation in a complete and decisive victory over the Khalifa and his Dervish hordes. According to the dispatches the entire Dervish army, numbering about 10,000, was either killed or captured, and the story is entirely credible, for a Dervish never runs away. This brief campaign and the victory in which it culminates is a fitting compliment to Gen. Kitchener's successful campaign against Obdurman last year. The capture of Obdurman was the most important step which had been taken in many years toward British control in the Soudan and the elimination of the dangerous and fanatical Dervishes. The victory of last Friday confirms and extends the results of that campaign to such a degree that it may be said that the Soudan is now practically open for colonization, commerce or any other civilized use to which it can be put.

The visit of Emperor William to his grandmother, Queen Victoria, has been the source of prolific speculation on the part of those European politicians who interpret it as an event of more political than domestic significance. The German semi-official organs have declared that no alliance, understanding or other form of diplomatic intimacy between Germany and England is involved in the visit, but still the opinion prevails that the Kaiser is moved by more Kaiserly considerations than family affection. The partly published and partly secret agreement between England and Germany regarding the partition of Samoa and the return which England is to receive for the surrender of her share, gives color to this suspicion that William is paying court for the moment less to his grandmother than to his grandmother's government. The eyes of Europe were upon him to see whether his actions in England would confirm this suspicion, but the lamented death of Lady Salisbury, wife of the British prime minister, at the very beginning of the emperor's visit, set aside for the present all considerations of diplomacy. However William intended it, it will probably end by being purely a friendly visit. It seems most likely that his original intention was to encourage the friendly feeling between the two governments, but to make the personal side of it prominent in the eyes of the world to avoid a possible coolness between Germany and Russia. We hope that he did mean his visit to have diplomatic significance as indicating sympathy with England. The Anglo-Saxon duality, England and America, is a good thing, but the Teutonic trinity, England, America and Germany, would be better.

In the island territories which we have lately acquired from Spain Roman Catholicism was established by law. It needs no argument to prove that one necessary and instantaneous result of the transfer of sovereignty is disestablishment. But that process is not so simple as it at first seems.

What constitutes disestablishment? The first element of it is evidently the cessation of the ancient custom by which the state levies ecclesiastical taxes and pays the running expenses of the church including the salaries of the priests. It is easy enough to arrange that matter. The government can simply cease to collect and disburse revenue for the church. If the church, can not collect its own revenue without compulsion by the civil authorities it is an indication that the people are not in sympathy with it, and that it does not deserve to have any revenues. But there is another element of disestablishment, namely, the disposition of ecclesiastical property. In Porto Rico, where this problem is most intricate, by far the greater part of the church property is held nominally by the state. The fact is, there has never been any clear distinction between the church and state; the church was a function of the state and the state owned the buildings which the church used, just as it owned the buildings which the courts used. When a new church was to be built a municipal tax would be levied, no deed would be recorded and the question as to ownership of the building was one which neither did nor could come up under the old regime. Everybody knew what it was there for and who was to use it. It will not do in the name of disestablishment to take this property away from the church because it lacks the formal title deeds. However the money was raised it came for the most part from Catholics. On the other hand, if the thing is administered too loosely exorbitant claims are sure to be filed by the Catholic clergy. There is room for some careful investigation and wise judgment to get at the equity of the matter.

Brutality, bloodshed and rapine are not the only evils of war. Among the less tragic but equally inevitable accompaniments of the call to arms must be mentioned war poetry. In times of general patriotic excitement, there is always the danger that certain prosaic souls will mistake patriotic fervor for poetic inspiration. In part, it is more than a danger; it is a grievous certainty. The case is painfully analogous to that of the callow lover (we have all known him, even if we will not confess that we have been he), who seeks a lyric outlet for the pent up emotions of his soul, but without the efficient co operation of the Muses. The said emotions may be above criticism, but the metrical expression usually fails to elicit popular sympathy. The world loves a patriot as unanimously as it loves a a lover, but who does not pray to be delivered from the frantic verse of the prosaic patriot? Our own late war was signally prolific of this sort of pseudo-literature, and it is fitting that the sympathy of all true Americans should go out to our sister nation in her present conflict in South Africa, and that entirely apart from our private judgments regarding the rights and wrongs of the Boers. Most of us conceive that the political interests of America and Britain are more closely allied than those of any two great nations, and that we owe a measure of sympathy on that account. But however that may be, there is no disputing the fact that our language is one and our literature is one, and we cannot be indifferent to the literary atrocities which are being daily perpetrated in England in the name of patriotism. We prefer not to quote samples of this sort of thing. Happily there has been some war poetry of a better sort. The London Times published recently a war poem in praise of the heroism of eight Boers who in the battle of Elandsleagte drew the British fire on themselves and courted death, which seven of them won, to cover the retreat of their comrades. This is not only good peotry, but is a praiseworthy example of generous admiration of a worthy foe. Mr. Kipling, whose "White Man's Burden" was the most notable poem suggested by our war, has written a ballad which is having wide popularity, albeit there are many, even of his friends, who do not consider it a very high order of poetry. It was written in the interest of the relief fund and the price which he received for it, $1250, was turned over to that fund. One of the refrains, which is a fair sample of the whole, runs as follows:

"Cook's son, Duke's son, son of a belted Earl,
Son of a Lambeth publican—it's all the same to-day.
Each of 'em doing his country's work (and who's to look after the girl?)
Pass the hat for your credit's sake, and pay, pay, pay!"

Most Americans, if called on to give an off-hand estimate, would say that the annual literary output of this country, estimated by the number of volumes, is as great as that of any other land, or that we would at least be second only to Great Britain. The exact figures are not easy to arrive at, but a genius for statistics has gathered reliable data representing the annual production of books in thirteen countries for several years. From the tables which have been constructed on these data we glean some surprising facts. The United States is not first or second in the list, but fifth, being preceded by Germany, France, Italy and Great Britain, in the order named. Germany publishes annually nearly five times as many books as the United States and Italy nearly twice as many. The total number of books published annually in these thirteen countries is put at 77,250, of which 5,315, or a trifle more than one fifteenth are issued in the United States. It appears, therefore, that as regards bulk of literature we are somewhat below the average in a list which includes such minor countries as Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Canada and Egypt. To get the real total of the literary product, periodical literature would have to be taken into consideration, and that would doubtless bring up our average. But even without considering this mitigating circumstance, we are not at all sure that it is a disadvantage to occupy a position somewhat remote from the head of this list. Literature is not measured by the ton, the mile or the thousand, and it is still a very open question whether our literary product may not be as valuable, in the aggregate, as that of some of our more voluminous neighbors. If it could be done judiciously we would rather see our five thousand deminished than increased. Another surprise which these tables reveal is the fact that in the whole seventy-seven thousand, the books classed as "educational and classical" are by far the most numerous, fiction coming second after a considerable interval.

WE SECOND THE MOTION AND MAK ANOTHER.

Referring to an article of Prof. H. L Willett in the last Christian Quarterly o "A New Vocation," that of teacher of th Bible, which he urged on the ground popular ignorance of the Bible, and th demand for more adequate instruction, Pre J. W. McGarvey, in Christian Standar says:

I am glad of the opportunity to commen Bro. Willett for his article, and to commen his proposal to the thoughtful consideration the brethren. It looks in the direction of re storing one of the elements of primitive Chris tianity, that of teacher; for in addition t apostles, prophets, evangelists and shepherd there was a class in the apostolic churche called teachers. These degenerated into th catechists of the third century, whose busi ness it was to teach candidates for baptism catechism instead of teaching them the text the Scriptures. Let us restore the ancien teacher. And why not make this one of ou advances toward apostolic practice during th incoming twentieth century? What more glo rious achievement can we set our aims upo than a thorough training of the disciples i the Word of the Lord?

It gives us no little pleasure to note thi hearty agreement between the two me who may be said to fairly represent the tw phases of Bible criticism among us. W are especially pleased to know that Bro McGarvey has found something in Bro Willett's writing to commend to his read ers. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is gla of the privilege of expressing its hearty agreement with both these brethren in th above, and to commend Bro. McGarvey' commendation of Bro. Willett's Quarterly article.

We wish, further, to second Bro. McGar vey's motion to make this restoration o the Bible teacher "one of our advances to ward apostolic practice during the incom ing twentieth century." We do not think however, it need take a whole century t carry out Prof. Willett's recommendation If the churches and the colleges will heart ily co-operate in this matter the first quar ter of the 20th century will witness the in troduction and active work of a strong corps of specially trained and qualified Bible teachers, who will teach in our col leges, and in connection with our state universities, and lead our churches and schools on into broader fields of biblica knowledge. Herein lies the solution o many difficulties and differences about the Bible—a better understanding of the Book —its writers, its history, its literary feat ures, its divine and human elements.

And while we are at it, we will make another motion, and we hope Bro. Mc Garvey will second it. It is that we do now lay on the table, for the time being, all questions pertaining to the legitimacy, the propriety and the danger of "higher criti cism," and devote ourselves for the next few years, with single heartedness, to study ing the Scriptures in the light of the sound est learning of the age, and—not less im portant—in the light of our own Christian experience, as we practice its holy teach ing, and with the perfect liberty which we have in Christ.

We predict that if these two motions be adopted and carried out, the next decade will witness a greater advancement in biblical knowledge, and in the development of the Christian life among us than would result from a century's controversy over the technicalities and recondite problems o "higher criticism." Do we hear a second to our motion to lay on the table?

WHY WE SHOULD BE THANKFUL.

The nation or people that ceases to recognize the hand of God in their history, and to render thanks unto Him who is the Author of all good, has already begun that decline which can only end in dissolution and decay. The proclamations of the President of the United States and the governors of the various states, setting apart a day in which the people of the United States are to give thanks to Almighty God for His blessings, remind us that we are not such a nation; that our highest executive officers in the state and nation, voicing the sentiments of the people who have elevated them to these positions of trust and responsibility, do recognize that divine Providence by which alone nations as well as individuals exist.

What reasons should move us to gratitude and thanksgiving at this time? For what should we specially be thankful now?

For our birth as a free and independent nation—the highest exemplification of democracy or self-government which the world has ever seen.

For increasing evidence of the presence of God's guiding hand in all our national history, shaping our course and preparing us continually for a larger destiny.

For the growing power and influence of our great republic among the nations of the earth, and for the fact that that influence will be exerted in behalf of freedom and civilization.

For the friendship that exists between our own government and the leading nations of the earth, and for evidence that this friendship and co-operation will be utilized for the benefit of the world.

For a fruitful season and abundant harvests, furnishing ample sustenance for the wants of man and beast and making glad the heart of the husbandman.

For freedom from internal strifes or the deadly ravages of such plagues as have desolated other portions of the earth.

For the prosperity of schools and colleges and the general advancement of intelligence among the masses of the people, to whom are offered benefits of free education to an extent unknown elsewhere on the earth.

For the growth and prosperity of the churches and the general advancement of the kingdom of God in our own and other lands.

For the increase in missionary zeal and the success of missionary effort in extending the knowledge of the Christian religion and of Christian civilization throughout the earth.

For the growing spirit of unity among the churches, bringing believers of different names into closer sympathy and co-operation, and prophesying the ultimate fulfillment of the prayer of Jesus for the oneness of his discipless.

For the growing interest in Bible study and the increasing knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, which lie at the basis of all true culture and true progress among men.

For the growing consciousness of mutual obligations among men to live together in the spirit of human brotherhood, each caring for the things of others and having a regard to the welfare of his neighbor.

For individual mercies and blessings too numerous to mention, which have crowned our lives and led us to a new sense of our dependence upon that "divinity which shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will."

For blessings in our homes and families, where love abides, and whence radiate those influences which make for the stability of government and the advancement of the kingdom of God.

Coming to our own religious movement among the forces of Christendom, we have abundant reason to be thankful for many signal tokens of divine favor:

For peace and prosperity among our churches, and for the increase which they have had in numbers and in spiritual growth.

For the success of our missionary organizations during the past year, and for the growing liberality of our membership and churches in behalf of the world's evangelization.

For the great Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati, celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of our mission work, which, in numbers, in enthusiasm, in devotion to the principles for which our movement stands, has attracted wide attention throughout the country and is without a parallel in the great religious gatherings of this country.

For the bond of unity in faith, in worship and in work which binds the churches of this Reformation together, and for the triumph of those principles of Christian liberty and Christian loyalty which lie at the foundation of our success.

For the increased emphasis which is being laid by our press and pulpit on spiritual life and power, and on the necessity of increased devotion to Christ and His Word in order to the accomplishment of our high mission in the world.

For the spirit of brotherhood and of unity in Christ which enables us, in spite of differences of opinion, to work together for the glory of God and for the triumph of His kingdom among men.

For these and countless other tokens of the divine blessing upon our country, our nation, our churches, our homes, and upon all the agencies that make for righteousness, let us give praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God, from whom all blessings flow.

EVANGELISTS AND EVANGELISM.

NUMBER II.

To evangelize is to proclaim or preach the gospel. An evangelist is one who evangelizes. Evangelism is defined by the STANDARD DICTIONARY to be "zeal in spreading the gospel." Any man who proclaims the gospel is an evangelist. He may go from place to place, or he may remain in one community. If he makes known, orally, the good news concerning God as he reveals himself in the Christ, he is in the original and true sense of the word an evangelist.

The word evangelist, however, has come to signify, in popular usage, a preacher who goes from place to place holding revival meetings. This is the present popular signification of the word evangelist. Such men are sometimes called—men who go from place to place holding revival meetings—sometimes they call themselves, "professional revivalists" or "professional evangelists." Neither name is biblical, nor is the thing for which they stand scriptural.

In S. M. Martin's address at the Jubilee Convention he noted a difference between the New Testament evangelist and the modern "professional evangelist." The following are his words:

"The difference between a missionary and an evangelist is more fanciful and arbitrary than real, evangelists being neither more nor less than home missionaries. The home missionary is one sent to preach the gospel the 'dynamics' of the 'go' coming from behind! With us an evangelist is one who goes to preach the gospel when he is sent for. He is literally drawn into the engagement."

This is an important distinction. The "with us" of Bro. Martin's address has neither parallel nor warrant in the evangelism of the New Testament—unless in the case of Paul, when the man in a vision cried saying, "Come over into Macedonia and help us." But there is an important point of unlikeness between that incident and the "drawing" of a modern "professional" evangelist "into an engagement."

John the Baptist was a herald of good news. "The kingdom of heaven is at hand" was the gospel that he preached. He was an evangelist; but he did not go from place to place, nor was he "drawn into the engagement." He took his stand, and so preached "the gospel of the kingdom" as to "draw into the engagemant" the men of Jerusalem, Judea and the Jordan region. John the Baptist was an evangelist, but he did not speak of himself, nor did others speak of him as a "professional evangelist." "In those days came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judea" is the simple statement in the New Testament. Instead of going from place to place there "went out unto him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan." A man may be an evangelist, a proclaimer of the gospel, a herald of the good news, without going from place to place. Every preacher ought to be an evangelist. Every church ought to be a center of biblical evangelism. This is the "ancient order" on this subject.

Our Lord was, in the proper meaning of the word, an evangelist. Of him it is written: "Jesus went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom." Read A. McLean's tract on "Missions in the Life of Christ." Jesus went from place to place, and as he went he preached "the gospel of the kingdom." The Father sent him to do this work. He said that his "meat" and his "drink" was to "do the will" of his Father. He was wholly devoted to his work. Jesus did nothing else but preach and heal. His entire time was spent in going about "doing good." But he did not call himself a "professional evangelist," much less a "professional revivalist"—nor has any person even thought of applying these words to our Lord. To do so would seem to be almost blasphemous.

The word "professional" is commonly understood, in such a connection as that in which it is used in this paper, to indicate a person who renders service in the expectation of or for a financial remuneration, as well as to signify one who gives his entire time to a given art, or sport, or service. An amateur is one who practices an art or occupation for the love of it, but not as a profession or for a livelihood. The dictionary-maker says: "Professional, of or pertaining to a special occupation, OFTEN FOR GAIN: opposed to amateur." And again, "one who engages, FOR MONEY, to compete in sports; opposed to amateur." It is impossible for any right-minded person to even think of applying the words "professional evangelist" or "professional revivalist" to our Lord or to his harbinger.

Paul was not such a person. He was not a "professional" in the sense here indicated. The love of Christ constrained him. Out of a deep, pure, unselfish love toward God and toward man, Paul preached the Christ and him crucified. He counted all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus. Like his Lord, Paul became poor—for there is evidence that he belonged to a wealthy family—that through his poverty he might make others rich. This is the man who exhorted men to contentment with food and raiment. Our Lord and Paul both taught that the man who labors for the spiritual enrichment of men is worthy of food and raiment and shelter. But Paul was so far from being a "professional," as above defined, that he declined at times to accept that to which he was entitled lest some one should accuse him of preaching from a selfish motive.

In the prosecution of his work Paul went from place to place; but except when persecution or other circumstances compelled him to move on he remained a considerable length of time in one place. He spent a year and a half in Corinth. The historian says: "He dwelt there a year and six months, TEACHING the Word of God." Result: "Many of the Corinthians hearing, believed and were baptized." This was didactic evangelism.

This man spent three years in Ephesus, engaged in evangelistic work. He was three months in the Jewish synagogue. He was two years in the school of Tyrannus. In his address to the pastors of the Ephesian church when he was en route to Jerusalem he said: "By the space of these years I ceased not to admonish every one night and day with tears." To these pastors, bishops, elders, teachers, he said: "I gave you an example." The essence of this portion of his address is: "As you have seen me work, so do you serve the church." The work of Paul in Ephesus was didactic. To use the language of Geo. F. Hall in the conference of evangelists at the Jubilee Convention, Paul was a "pastor-evangelist." Query: Ought not all evangelists to unite to a greater degree than is now done the pastoral functions with the evangelistic?

Teaching was most prominent in Paul's evangelistic efforts. He did far more than simply persuade men to decide for Christ. To the Colossians he said that he "proclaimed" the Christ "admonishing every man and teaching every man." According to this statement Paul's work was threefold: (1) Proclamation; (2) admonition; (3) instruction. B. B. T.

Hour of Prayer.

THE WORK OF CHRISTIAN WOMEN.

(Phil. 4:1-3; Mark 14:3-9)

(Concert of Prayer for Missions.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer meeting Topic, Dec. 6th.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: Among the most steadfast friends of Jesus, during His earthly ministry, was a little band of Christian women that ministered to his necessities and bore witness for Him; and in the apostolic age they were recognized as colaborers with the apostles in the work of the gospel.

The first Lord's day in December is the day set apart for the interest of our Christian Woman's Board of Missions. This organization has just passed its 25th anniversary, and its record of growing power and usefulness is one for which we all feel grateful. No missionary organization among us has been more wisely managed, nor does any one of them occupy a higher place to-day in the confidence and affection of the brotherhood. It is entirely proper, therefore, that in this monthly concert of prayer for missions this organization should receive our attention and have the benefit of our prayers.

Considering the passages above cited in the reverse order in which they are given, let us note the significant feature of this incident recorded in Mark. It was in the last week of the earthly life of Jesus. Events were rapidly crowding to a crisis. The great tragedy of the cross was rising distinctly on the horizon. The enemies of Jesus were becoming bolder and more determined, and many even of His professed friends had forsaken Him. At a time like that it was a woman, whose heart had been touched by the teaching and the pure and majestic personality of Christ, who came in the room where He was reclining at a meal, carrying an alabaster cruse of ointment of spikenard, very costly, which she brake and poured upon the head of Him who had won the homage and devotion of her heart.

It was pre-eminently an act of love, of unselfish devotion to the Master. It was the impulse of her womanly heart, intended to express her gratitude to Him for what He had done for her. The incident awakened indignation among some of the guests, who regarded the act as "a waste of the ointment," which might have been sold for the benefit of the poor. But Jesus came to her rescue as the true friend of womanhood, saying: "Let her alone; why trouble ye her? She hath wrought a good work on me. . . . She hath done what she could: she hath anointed my body aforehand for the burial. And verily I say unto you, Wheresoever the gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, that also which this woman hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her."

Was there ever such a memorial shaft reared to any person as Jesus here erected for this woman for her unselfish act of personal devotion? Our Christian women have had their opponents and fault-finders, but is not Jesus still saying: "Let them alone; why trouble ye them? They have wrought a good work for me?" The significant point in the lesson is that Christ accepts and honors a service of love. That is why His blessings have rested so richly upon the work of these Christian women. They have not been seeking offices and honors, but have been constrained by His love to attempt to do something for Him who has done so much for them, and He has accepted their service and blessed them.

In the church at Philippi, which had its origin in a woman's prayer-meeting, there was a band of Christian women who, in some way, were seeking to serve their Master. There had grown up a little difference between two of the leading women, Euodia and Syntyche, and Paul exhorts them "to be of the same mind in the Lord." And he exhorts the preacher and his "true yokefellow," also, to "help these women, for they labored with me in the gospel." That is an exhortation that holds good to-day to the preachers of the churches everywhere. "Help these women" by your counsel, by your presence in their meetings, if possible, by announcements and by a sermon occasionally in the interest of their work. They also are laborers together with us in the gospel—a fact which has not always been remembered by some preachers.

We do not know the nature or the extent of the work which the women at Philippi were engaged in, but we are sure that it was not more important and not more acceptable to the Lord than the work which is being done by our Christian women through the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. They are entitled, therefore, to the hearty co-operation of the ministry and of the brethren generally in all their work. If any one doubts its value let him inquire of the mission stations in India and Jamaica and in our own country. If they would know what it is doing for our own Christian women in promoting their intellectual and spiritual power, let them attend one of their national or state conventions and listen to their addresses and witness their order, their devotion and their insight into the needs of the world. Blessing others by their labors, they have blessed themselves, their homes, their children and the churches with which they are identified.

Their work in inaugurating Bible Chairs in connection with our state universities is, in itself, a monument to their wisdom and to their enterprise. Let us pray that a large number of the Christian women that have not yet been enlisted in this work may become interested in it, that they also may share in its benefits and in the joy of knowing that they are helping to make the world better and brighter.

PRAYER.

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for consecrated Christian womanhood. We thank Thee for what the gospel has done for woman, and we thank Thee for what Christian women are doing for the spread of the gospel. We pray Thy blessings to continue to rest in rich abundance upon the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, that it may be more and more an agency for the dissemination of the gospel and the establishment of Thy kingdom on earth. We pray Thee to bless their missionaries, their officers and their helpers, and may they receive the assistance and co-operation of their brethren with whom they are co-laborers in the gospel. For Christ's sake. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

It is well that these gray and dreary November days are made bright and joyous by the coming of Thanksgiving day. It is a beautiful custom, and one that has its origin in the best part of our nature, this setting apart one day in the autumnal season, when the harvests have been gathered in, and the bending orchards have been unladen, and the vineyards have yielded their purple fruit, to meet in our accustomed places of worship to give thanks unto Him who is the gracious Giver of all these blessings. We are indebted to our New England ancestors for Thanksgiving day. They have had many hard things said against them, one of which is that on landing "they first fell on their knees and then on the aborigines!" But in spite of this they have bequeathed to this nation much that has tended to make it the strong and mighty nation that it is. Thanksgiving is one of them, and wherever men shall be gathered throughout this nation, in compliance with the proclamation of the President and with those of the governors of the various states, there will be a memorial of those early New England days, when these sturdy pioneers, who grappled with the wilderness for their sustenance, recognized the duty of thanksgiving to God.

One of the delightful features of the Thanksgiving season is the home gatherings. It is the custom for those who can do so to return to the old ancestral roof on Thanksgiving to greet the old folks at home and to make it a day of family reunions. In many a home throughout the land aged ones have been counting the weeks and the days when the boys and girls who have married and gone off to themselves, some of them far away, will be returning home. The fires on many a hearthstone gleam more brightly to-day because of this reunion of families in the old home. Perchance there will be the singing of some of the old songs with voices that have not mingled together for many a day, and there will be stories and incidents and reminiscences, and the eyes will grow brighter and hearts kindlier and home ties stronger under the influence of these surroundings. Thank God for the happy homes of America, and for whatever adds to their sacredness and good cheer!

And then the spectacle of large audiences gathered in the churches to remember the goodness of God, and to speak of all His wondrous works, is in itself an object-lesson of far-reaching value to the nation. Ten thousand doxologies will ring out from ten thousand churches as the glad-hearted people unite their voices to "praise God, from whom all blessings flow." The prayers will recount the mercies we have received from the hand of our Father, and the speakers will remind us how God's hand has led us as a nation and as churches and as individuals. There will be warnings against dangers. There will be emphasis laid on national blessings, and a kindly word will be spoken for the poor and needy. Altogether, it will be a great day for the nation, and millions of hearts will be touched with the sense of their obligations to God, and with the duty of living more worthy of His mercies.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will enter heartily into the family reunions and into the fellowship of the greater assemblies of public worship, and lend its sanction to every movement that tends to make men more mindful of God and more grateful for His blessings. We have our own reasons for thanksgiving, and we heartily join with our readers in giving thanks to God for His unfailing mercies and for His loving kindness. But Thanksgiving day will not have accomplished its highest purpose for us if it does not lead us to an earnest effort to make our lives more in harmony with God's will; if it does not inspire us with a desire to be givers of good things to others according to the measure of our ability, that we may be children of our heavenly Father, who loves to bestow blessings upon us. That is not true gratitude to God which does not manifest itself in kindliness and helpfulness to others. If we feel that God has been good to us, there is no way in which we can so acceptably show our appreciation as by being good to our fellowmen. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Questions and Answers.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—In the "Christian Standard," of this city, is an article entitled "R. C. Cave on J. H. Garrison." As a subscriber to both the St. Louis and Cincinnati organs, I respectfully ask that you answer these questions:

1. Did brother Garrison "drive" any one from the fellowship of the Church of Christ for entertaining or expressing religious views different from his own when the latter brother maintained faith in and obedience to the divine Christ?

This same article says:

"Should he (Garrison) hereafter reach the same attitude, etc., then neither he nor his friends could object if he should be driven in the same direction!"

Again, may I ask:

2. Does the Standard (or any other paper) represent anyone having authority to drive good people from the church?

I have personally been endeavoring to follow closely the "high" and "low" criticism debates going on, more or less, in our press for the past year or two, and it has been both profitable and enjoyable. But it is a sad spectacle to behold, in this enlightened age, anybody, or any paper, even indirectly, a party to driving any member from Christ's Church who loves liberty as well as Christ!

The Christian Church is not yet entirely free from bigotry. I pray God that I may live here long enough to see it so.

As a plain, every-day layman, I want to read all I can on the subject of socalled "higher criticism." I believe God is with us, and so long as we have the divine Christ as our foundation stone, we can, and should cheerfully welcome the searchlight of honest criticism from any quarter!

Any cause will and should die, sooner or later, which cannot nor will not bear it.

W. T. PURSELL.

Cincinnati, O.

1. This first question may be answered with an emphatic negative. No one knows better than Bro. McGarvey the fundamental grounds on which we opposed Bro. R. C. Cave. Since he saw proper to make any reference to the matter at all it is a little strange, to say the least, that he did not state this fact. We did not seek to "drive" Bro. Cave from the fellowship of the church, but to win him back to such fellowship when we found that he held views which were in direct antagonism to what is most fundamental in our religious position. Gladly would we welcome him back to day on his acceptance of these fundamental principles. The writer of the article in question so often confuses mere differences of opinion with the denial of what is fundamental in Christianity that it is, perhaps, not surprising, after all, that he should fail to make the discrimination to which we have referred.

2. We cannot say what the Standard claims to represent. We do not recognize any one or any body of men among us, much less any religious paper, as having authority to "drive good people from the church." By "good people," in this connection, of course, we mean, as our querist no doubt means, Christian people; that is, those who believe in Christ and are trying to follow Him. No doubt our brother is right, too, in saying that there is even yet manifested among us occasionally a species of bigotry and of intolerance toward those holding a different view from the most of us on questions of criticism or interpretation that is wholly inconsistent with our broad, catholic position and with our plea for Christian unity. This is to be expected, however. We are men of "like passions" and frailties, even as others, and we have not all risen to the height nor to the breadth of the great position we occupy and of the great plea we make for the union of Christians. But we are making progress in this direction, and it is safe to prophesy a time, not far distant, when one among us may hold an opinion on the subject of biblical criticism different from those held by the main body of his brethren, or even by the editors of our religious journals, without being regarded as a heretic or as having denied the faith.

What is your opinion concerning Paul's statement to the brethren of Rome (Rom. 13: 8)? B. L. Sears.

Liverpool, Tex.

The passage referred to is a familiar one: "Owe no man anything, save to love one another; for he that loveth his neighbor hath fulfilled the law." The statement is made in connection with the apostle's instruction to the brethren at Rome concerning tribute. They were taught to render to all their dues, "tribute to whom tribute, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor." He then lays down the general principle that we "owe no man anything;" that is, that we discharge our honest obligations toward all men. There is one obligation, however, that can never be fully discharged, which is a perpetual one, that of loving one another. This does not, we think, prohibit the creation of such financial obligations as come in the course of legitimate business transactions, but it does inculcate the duty of meeting these obligations when they are due, and this exhortation is quite as needful in our day as it was when it was originally given.

I noticed yesterday that the Georgia Legislature was seemingly about to pass a state prohibition law. If they pass it, and if our Christian Church people are ever to take any stand on the great Christian questions of the world, would it not be well for our churches everywhere to pass resolutions of congratulation to that legislature? and is it not the duty of our Christian editors to urge our churches to pass such congratulations? J. S. Hughes.

It would, no doubt, strengthen the hands of the law-abiding and law-enforcing, the saloon-hating and the saloon-closing people of the country, and especially of Georgia, if such congratulatory resolutions were passed, both by local churches and by ministerial alliances, in case the Georgia Legislature passes a prohibitory law.

COMMENTS ON AND EXCERPTS FROM THE CONGREGATIONAL COUNCIL IN BOSTON.

BY REV. DR. MICHAEL BURNHAM.

The late Council of the Congregational Church, held in Boston, was but the flower and fruit of Congregationalism in its ecumenical form. Its purpose was not creed, like some of the great councils in the centuries that have preceded, in the church, Catholic or Protestant. Its character was fellowship and conference. There were but few moments in the council when we approached the manifest desire, perhaps, of more definite statements with regard to the spiritual beliefs and attitudes of the church. Those moments were moments when we were lifted into high spiritual conditions and emotions by speakers like Jones and Cave and Forsyth, who brought us to the very center and foundation of our faith and presented to us a living, dying, rising, reigning Christ, by whose condescending love and sacrifice we are saved. There were a few such moments in the council, pre-eminently after such an address as that of Dr. Forsyth, of England, professor in Mansfield College, Cambridge, associated with Dr. Fairbairn.

At the close of his address a part of that council would seemingly have been ready to commit itself to the highest expression of its faith in an atoning Savior, who has the right to our implicit obedience and by whose Spirit alone we are regenerated and sanctified. But even that mighty wave of impulse expressed itself in the singing of the hymn, "In the Cross of Christ I Glory." We were not a creed-making congregation. I do not know when the church is coming again to her creed-making periods, if ever. She is insisting, it seems to me, as a whole upon other things to-day—upon Christianity as a life—upon the faith in Christ as something for his people, sufficiently set forth in the symbols of his church thus far made, and the sacraments of his church as at present administered; and a kind of feeling seems to be prevailing in the multitude of God's followers and struggling into expression here and there that Christianity is a life, and the less of creed the better, and the way to that life set forth in the person, word and work of Jesus Christ; that that life must be expressed, not alone in language, but in spirit and life and in power and in the acceptance as a whole of the great historic facts of Christianity and the vital elements of truth as taught us in the Word of God more especially.

For the council great preparation was made; deliberate preparation was made to bring out so far as possible, by speakers and subjects, the great thoughts and themes on which our own church, in common with other evangelical denominations, are thinking. But I am bound to say that, from a calm and deliberate backward look upon the whole council, there was something deeper and holier than human speeches or human wisdom or speakers themselves. It seems to me that the trend of the great preparation that had been made for the great council was rather in the line of education and ethics, in the usual acceptance of that term, than spiritual life or an evangel. Abundant preparation had been made to get at the philosophy, if possible, of the evangel if not at the evangel itself. But, notwithstanding all preparation, yes, and deeper and better and truer than all preparation, was the leading of that convention by the Spirit of God. We were held again and again face to face with God, and the manifest dominant tone of the council was a continuous coming back in devotion of spirit to a suffering, dying, atoning, risen, conquering, ever-living Christ, the Savior of the world. No one could leave that council without that impression being made indellibly upon him, that Jesus Christ is the Savior of the world, the King eternal, immortal, invisible, and the Holy Spirit is constantly taking of the things of Christ and revealing unto us.

In preparation for the council, among other things, we cannot fail to note special attention called to the faces and lives, in some of the papers, of men on this side the Atlantic, when living, like Leonard Bacon, of New Haven; Henry M. Dexter, of the Congregationalist; Alonzo H. Quint; Mark Hopkins, president of Williams College, and so long president of the American Board. All these have been mighty in their influence, not only upon our own church and denomination, but upon modern Christian thought.

Preceding the council came out a review of Dr. Munger's "Horace Bushnell," under the title of "God's Way with the Soul." Attention had been called to the book, noting the fact that Dr. Bushnell marked a new epoch in the history of more liberal thought in this century. There were tender references made to the memory of Lamson and Dale.

Preceding the council, also, came an article by Dr. Storrs, entitled "The Christian Message of Congregational Churches," in which, under the freedom of the local church, in reference to our own body, he declares: "Of course, it is a primary premise with us that each local assembly of believers . . . . is a true Christian church, having within it the divine life, capable of choosing and instituting its officers, managing its affairs, responsible fundamentally to no other church, though bound to live in fellowship of spirit with all others, and as far as possible in co-operation in Christian work." "This," he declared, "is the root-idea of Congregationalism, justified by the New Testament, justified in practice by beneficent effects. It reduces to a minimum the ambitious desire for denominational expansion. It tends to invigorate the just self-respect of each local assembly, and it gives to the moral alliances between such assemblies a virtue and potency surpassing any of formal compacts. It seems to us connected with many things important to the peace and the power of the kingdom of God." It was this, he declared, also, that brought to each local church freedom for enrichment, unity in faith. In this the Congregational Church finds its sharp antithesis in the notion that a valid ministry can only be had through Episcopal ordination and that the one appropriate instrument for public worship is "the prayerbook from cover to cover." "A recent convert to the Episcopal Church is said to have eulogized it as 'the roomiest church in America.'" Dr. Storrs said: "So far as differing theories of personal religion are concerned, or differing interpretations of the creeds, or different attitudes of mind toward the Scriptures, this is very likely true, if we except congregations joined in the Unitarian fellowship; but in its insistence on strict uniformity in matters of outward method and form that church—to the grief of many of its ministers and members—is the narrowest and most restrictive of Protestant communions."

Dr. Storrs emphasized the firm evangelical basis of the churches represented by his order; he emphasized their positive hold "on the sovereign Headship of Christ" and "on the truths fundamental and organific which have come by his gospel." "Nor have these churches ever been timid before emerging opinions, however novel. Their belief in the verities assumed or announced by the gospel, in sin, atonement, regeneration, in the final judgment with its tremendous adjudication, in the permanent authority of the Scriptures, and pre-eminently of him who is forever the Incarnate Word, is to-day, in my judgment, as vital and governing as it ever has been. That ministry is, therefore, always most honored among these churches which sets forth these truths with clearest emphasis and urges them on men with most determinate push and power. An educated ministry has been from the first an ideal with them."

He called attention to the church as true to its Pilgrim ancestors, with a temper minutely practical, with a redeemed society as the end in view, with the gospel as the only effective agency; a divine evangel first for individual hearts and then for communities; a church of world-wide missions and believing with all the heart in the dispensation of the Spirit, with a message of hope inspiring and indestructible, in the name of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

The personnel of the council, in its president and vice-president and the long array of speakers appointed and delegates appointed and distinguished men from both sides the water and from round the world, was in itself inspiring; and the hospitality of Boston, lavish, well-nigh boundless. We could ill afford to spare Boston from our list of American cities. With all the burdens put upon its churches it carried our council, with its 1,200 ministerial tickets issued and its great assemblies of three thousands and more people three times a day, as easily as if it were but an every-day occurrence.

In the opening of the council Dr. Alexander Mackennal led the congregation in an earnest and tender prayer for the presence of Christ and the gift of his Spirit upon the council—and the council had begun.

And now I can speak briefly of only a few of the many things that impressed me.

In the first place, no man could move in an assembly of such men for more than a week without being impressed by something more than numbers. Gov. Wolcott said in his opening address this: "I think that to him who reads history the most conspicuous and impressive lesson taught by her many pages is the force and the power and the influence of individuals." And I am sure one cannot turn to the personnel of that council as represented by men on this side the water like Dr. Storrs, Dr. Fisher, Dr. Angell and many younger men, together with the presidents of our colleges and professors from our theological seminaries, or upon the appointed delegates and speakers from abroad like Dr. Fairbairn, known around the world; Dr. Alexander Mackennal, from Bowdon, England; Dr. John Brown, of Bedford, England; Dr. Cave, of Hackney College; Albert Spicer, of London; Dr. Bevan, of Melbourne; Dr. Thompson, of London; Rev. J. J. Halley, of Australia, and a host of others, without feeling the power of personality. Never was there a day in the history of the church when the power of personality in men who train hundreds of scholars, who have written books, who have written magazines, who hold positions that are honored, who lead congregations and serve churches, who influence cities and compel states to yield homage and a nation to do honor, who lead armies and multitudes, was greater than to-day. I say the power of such personality was never a mightier fact in human history or had a mightier place in human history than it has to-day.

One could not come in contact with or listen to our English brethren without feeling a sense of gratitude to God that our American Republic is out from under the influences of a state church. Our free churches and our free schools, and our consequent freedom from slavery to institutions in various forms on which the state has set its seal, whether right or wrong, and said, "This is what I honor," ought to kindle within us a new enthusiasm to battle and set right some of the wrongs, and great wrongs, that yet exist in our own free American life. A kind of slavery to the state church has thrown its spell over, in the past, even such men as Fairbairn and Mackennal. One could not come in contact with it, whether as manifest in the attitude of Hirst Hollowell or our good Bro. Horne, who spoke to us in St. Louis with such edification, without feeling its power. Think of a school for which you are taxed, and yet which your child cannot enter without giving up his freedom in church matters! Think of a church creating social life and barriers, influencing everything! But this, with its now Romanizing tendencies, has had its wonderful influence, and it has driven the dissenting church of England in all denominations to stand together and to fight together for a common cause. And in the last decade, while under freedom and liberalism of thought our American churches and pastors and professors have, some of them, drifted far and wide on the sea of speculation, our English brethren have been drawing together and becoming more and more spiritual and more and more direct in their acceptance of and presentation of the truths that build up Christian institutions. And we need to pray for our mother country.

I was impressed with the struggles of the church of God of the present day to find an authority which should bind all our consciences and unite us as the church of Christ; and I think if you took the gradations of statements in that council and compared them on this point in an ascending series, you were impressed after all with the unity of the conclusion. You certainly could not fail to be impressed with the enthusiasm aroused when What constitutes authority for us as Christians in matters of doctrine and life was presented by that council.

In his address on "Fundamental Principles in Theology," Pres. Geo. Harris said: "The fundamental principle of theology is that God is love, and the love of the Son of God is the love of God; the suffering Son of God is the suffering God; God spared not his own Son, but gave him freely for us all. We do not make our painful way to God, but God in Christ makes his great way to us to redeem us to ourselves. The last word of science is man? No. The last word of science is God, inseparable subject and object in one final sentence. Man and God are the last words of history, of philosophy, of theology, of religion. God creates men in his own image of holiness. God redeems men in the Christ, that they may be conformed to the image of his Son. God sanctifies men through the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of light, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son." And while you could have wished for more, you come to feel that no man with such a statement can fail to be in fundamentals right as to what constitutes the seat of authority.

ACTUAL AND FORMAL REMISSION OF SINS.

A. B. JONES.

It is a fact, that this distinction is recognized and made by all the great teachers and creeds of Protestant Christendom. There are no exceptions to this so far as known to me. With a unanimity, as great as obtains on any other prominent point of Christian doctrine, these authorities all declare that the Heavenly Father, through the mediation of his Son, actually forgives the sinner on the moral grounds of his surrender to Christ as his Savior. This surrender of the soul is, in the New Testament, sometimes denominated faith, sometimes repentance, sometimes conversion, sometimes born of God, etc. But the actual, personal, parental forgiveness is a moral transaction, a moral effect, resulting from the moral change wrought in the soul of the sinner. And, yet, these same authorities declare baptism, in some sense, "for the remission of sins." While they may not so style it, yet they hold to the distinction between actual and formal remission of sins. As an example of this I place before the reader the two declarations of the Holy Spirit through Peter; one in his sermon to the Gentiles, the other in his sermon to the Jews, with the exegesis of Dr. Hackett, one of the most distinguished exegetes of the Baptist Church.

1. Through his name, whosoever believeth on him shall receive remission of sins (Acts 10:43).

2. Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins (Acts 2:38).

Concerning the first passage Hackett says, a. "Through him as possessing the attributes and sustaining to men the relations of which his name is the index." b. "The condition of pardon is faith in Christ; and this condition brings the attainment of pardon within the reach of all."

Concerning the second passage he says, "We connect the forgiveness of sins naturally with both the preceding verbs. This clause, in order to the forgiveness of sins, states the motive or object which should induce them to repent and be baptized." The question arises, Did the Holy Spirit, speaking through Peter, in regard to remission of sins, on these two occasions, contradict himself; and did Dr. Hackett, in his exegesis of these two passages, contradict himself in Christian doctrine? The only way to obviate that conclusion is in the distinction between actual and formal remission.

It is a fact, that Alexander Campbell held to this distinction—held to it to the end of his life. Dr. Richardson, his biographer, presents Mr. Campbell in this light, beyond all question. He dwells at great length on the religious views of Mr. Campbell. He is careful to show that Mr. C. held to the distinction between actual and formal remission of sins; that he did not advocate a mere legalistic view of this subject; that he entered a protest when he saw a tendency of that sort among his brethren. In speaking on this point of extremes, and of abuse of a doctrine, Dr. Richardson says (Vol. II, page 288), "Mr. Campbell greatly disapproved the practice of making such issues, and of using such strong and unguarded expressions as the 'power of remitting sins' and 'washing away sins in baptism.' 'These,' said he, 'have been most prejudicial to the cause of truth, and have given a pretext to the opposition for their hard speeches against the pleadings of Reformers.' The habitual use of such expressions he thought also calculated to lead men to overlook or disparage that faith in the sacrifice of Christ from which alone baptism derived its efficacy. On this account, in baptizing persons, he used only the simple formula, 'Into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit,' and forbore adding to it, like Mr. Scott and others, the expression 'for the remission of sins.' 'When any doctrine,' said he (Millennial Harbinger for 1832, p. 299), 'is professed and taught by many, when any matter gets into many hands, some will misuse, abuse and pervert it. This is unavoidable. We have always feared abuses and extremes.' "

Were Mr. Campbell alive to-day and fully at himself, and called on for an explicit statement of his views on this subject, I do not doubt but that he would say as he did in 1823, "Paul's sins were really pardoned when he believed, yet he had no solemn pledge of the fact, no formal acquittal, no formal purgation of his sins until he washed them away in the water of baptism." In referring to these as the matured views of both Thomas and Alexander Campbell, Dr. Richardson says (Vol. II, p. 84), "Thus, in 1823, the design of baptism was fully understood and publicly asserted."

That Dr. Richardson understood Mr. Campbell on this subject there can be no doubt. His long, intimate and confidential association with Mr. C. forbid any other conclusion. He has, then, either presented Mr. Campbell in his true light, or he has purposely misrepresented him before the public. And Mr. Campbell's writings abound in expressions that show conclusively that he always held to the distinction between actual and formal remission of sins. The actual remission on the moral grounds of repentance toward God and faith in Christ he did not dwell on and emphasize to the same extent that he did "baptism for the remission of sins," because there was not the same necessity for it. The evangelical world understood and accepted his idea of actual remission; but he thought they did not recognize and honor the scriptural idea of formal remission of sins in baptism to the extent it deserved. He felt the same way about the Lord's Supper, hence our custom of weekly communion. Hence also his earnest contention over baptism for remission in the true meaning of the words. When the Baptists held to the notion that baptism was because of actual remission of sins previously granted, Mr. Campbell protested, and contended that the Scriptures actually teach that baptism is in order to the remission of sins—the legal, formal, governmental remission. To emphasize this point before the world, he says, in his work on "Baptism with its Antecedents and Consequents," "Baptism is for the true, real formal remission of sins." Of course, he uses the word "real" here in a different sense from what he does when he says, "Paul's sins were really forgiven when he believed." No man uses the same word in the same sense always; nor does the Bible. When it says, "the devils believe," and "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," evidently the word "believe" is used in different senses. The editor of the Central Baptist, of St. Louis, commenting on my recent articles on "Actual and Formal Remission," says he accepts my views of actual remission, but does not accept my views of formal remission. Now here is a chance for an argument between the Central Baptist man and myself, in which I would say to him, "I hold that baptism is not because of the remission of sins, but is truly and really for the formal remission of sins." As certainly as actual remission changes a man's moral relations to God, so certainly does formal remission change his relations to the divine government. This was Mr. Campbell's contention, and this was his attitude as I understand him.

In conclusion, I want to thank the many brethren who have written me letters of appreciation and approval of my articles on this subject. Some of these letters have come from men occupying distinguished positions as thinkers, writers and speakers in our ranks, and abound in such expressions as "dangerous legalism," "your position is well taken," "you are correct," "reading you with great satisfaction," "your arguments unassailed and unassailable," "a plausible reply may be made, but your arguments will never be answered," etc.

THE PRE-EMINENT DANGER.

[The following is from a sermon by the Right Rev. Henry C. Potter, D. D., LL.D., N. Y., as it appeared in The Pulpit for November. His theme was "The Social Problems of our Country."—EDITOR.]

The pre-eminent danger to our social order in this day and age is, first, the growth of wealth, and then the abuse of it. Now then, you remember what were called the sumptuary laws, which undertook, from the time of the Dorians in Greece down and on to the time of Edward the Fourth in England and James the Second in Scotland, to regulate people's expenditures, and to restrict individual luxury or ostentation within very austere bounds. A Dorian or Spartan woman could not wear gold; a Roman woman could not possess a dress of different colors, nor ride, in the city, in a carriage. Tiberius Cæsar forbade the wearing of silk by men; Charles the Fifth prohibited large pointed shoes; Edward the Second issued a proclamation that no dinner should consist of more than two courses, and James the First, unfaithful, verily, to the traditions of Scotland, but mindful, doubtless, of the horrors of dyspepsia, forbade the use of pies to all persons under the rank of a baron—all of which Adam Smith, as some of you doubtless remember, calls "the impertinence of kings and ministers of state," and points out to be as false in its principle as it was impotent in its effect.

And yet, has it ever occurred to anybody to consider what, sooner or later, would be the effect upon the mass of their fellow-beings if a company or fellowship of men and women of recognized social leadership should bind themselves together to illustrate, in their habits of life, simplicity of attire, modesty of equipage, inexpensiveness in appointments, and chasteness in the aspects, proportions, furniture and decorations of their dwellings; should further bind themselves to discourage the habit of excessive accumulation; to employ for art, science, philanthropy and religion, all beyond a certain proportion of their income should devote a certain fixed time in every day to other human interests than their own, should devise and themselves co-operate in plans for softening the rigors of life to the less fortunate, and in bringing into the dull monotony of the modern conditions of manual labor, so far as might be, brightness and cheer—for seeking, in one word, to relieve our modern life from the tawdry, sordid, self-indulgent aspect which is too often, at what we call "the top," its dominant and prevailing note? For myself, I believe that, wild and visionary as such a suggestion doubtless sounds to many who hear me to-night, there are men and women in far greater numbers than most of us dream of, who would hail it as, for themselves, at any rate, a way out of a situation which, with our modern extravagance on the one hand, and our modern condition of poverty, degradation and despair, largely untouched, unrecognized and unredeemed on the other, is to many earnest natures as intolerable as it is appalling.

THANKSGIVING OBSERVATIONS.

The brief of an inaudible address, delivered to an invisible audience on an unknown occasion, in an unimportant inland town, by Prof. Littleknown, of Irontown, Sarcasm County, State of Discontent:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: This is the day when every man is expected to put away his complaints and to put on the garb of charity. No matter how much you have been sick during the year, how large your unpaid bills, how much you have lost or how hard the times have served you, you are expected this day to dress in sunshine and look smiles at all your neighbors. No matter how great your adversities during the year and how infrequently the dove of peace has hovered over your domicile for a like period of time, you are expected to have a family reunion and to rejoice that your lot in this world has not been worse than it has been. Or, perhaps you are a laboring man and owe your grocer, your landlord, your coal dealer and all your friends for borrowed money and cannot get trusted for another dime or another turkey, yet still are you expected to smile upon your family and tell them how thankful they ought to be that they are not living in an age when men were imprisoned for their debts.

Yes, ladies and gentlemen, this is the day of the year when the poorer a man is the more thankful he is expected to be; when the peace of his mind and the gratitude of his heart ought to be, as some suppose, in an inverse ratio to his worldly possessions. No matter how poor a man may become he still has much to be thankful for, to hear others tell it, but no one ever caught others in the act of stealing his occasion for gratitude. Of course, they will confirm their sincerity in the opinions and sympathy expressed by the gift of a dime, a dollar, a turkey or a square meal, here and there, to lighten the poor man's burden for another year, nevertheless the misfortunes that might have come to this poor man, but did not, are expected to be the true ground of his gratitude and real cause for rejoicing, for the day at least.

Yes, ladies and gentlemen, this is the day when the poor man is to forget that he is an individuality and to think of himself only as an organic part of one of the richest and the mightiest nations on the earth. Just think of the gold and the silver and the iron and the coal, the valleys and the hills, the lakes and the rivers, the iron horse, the shops, the mills, the stores and the cattle upon a thousand hills, all as yours, in a national sense, although entrusted, as a matter of course, to a few competent men for safekeeping. You may be poor, homeless, houseless, naked, hungry and penniless, but remember to rejoice in the fact that the combined wealth of the nation, on the pro rata theory, gives to every man, woman and child a comfortable home. Then slap your brawny hand down on your empty purse and remember that the cash of the nation, on the per capita basis, in that purse is more than $25. Do not stop to argue the difference between absolute and theoretical cash, but throw up your hat and shout for joy that you belong to such a nation. Let those who have the care of the actual cash do the fretting about its distribution.

And then think of our great civilization. Some may try to dampen your patriotism by pointing out its defects, but where else on earth can you find the church and the saloon, missionaries and rumsellers looking more unanimously and patriotically to the same flag for protection? Where on earth is another civilization that has produced more millionaires in the same length of time or that breeds more and better politicians? You will look in vain for its equal. Then go home think of the circumstances and be glad—if for nothing else, that you haven't yet touched bottom.

The audience then sang, Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow, and went out in search of a square meal.

Rest and Health to Mother and Child.

MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP has been used for over FIFTY YEARS by MILLIONS of MOTHERS for their CHILDREN WHILE TEETHING, with PERFECT SUCCESS. It SOOTHES the CHILD, SOFTENS the GUMS, ALLAYS all PAIN; CURES WIND COLIC, and is the best remedy for DIARRHŒA. Sold by Druggists in every part of the world. Be sure and ask for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" and take no other kind. Twenty-five cents a bottle.

Our Budget.

—O give thanks unto the Lord!

—Forget not all His benefits.

—Count up your individual mercies and see how much you have to be grateful for.

—If God has been good to you, pass it around; be good to somebody else. Doing good is contagious.

—The sound of advancing hosts is heard all along the battle lines. Is your church marching with the rest of the army or falling back with the stragglers?

—The war in Southern Africa and the Philippine Islands are not the only wars. The great conflict with unrighteousness goes on from age to age. From this warfare there can be no honorable discharge except by death.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST purposes to signalize the closing year of the 19th century by doubling its list of subscribers, and in this worthy enterprise we solicit the earnest co-operation of all who are in sympathy with the spirit and purpose of the paper Already we are receiving notes of encouragement from every part of the great field. Never was the prospect brighter for a great year's work than at present.

—While specially engaged, of course, in pushing forward the work committed to our care, we send our hearty greetings, this Thanksgiving season, to all our co-laborers, whether through the press, the pulpit, the forum, the teacher's chair, or in the lowlier but not less useful walks of life, and wish them also abundant success in all their undertakings and labors. There is room enough for all and there is work enough for all, and if we do it well, there will be honor enough for all, as Admiral Schley said of the Battle of Santiago.

—As we contemplate the providence of God over men during the past year the truthfulness of the following tender, yet eloquent words of David stand forth in wondrous sublimity:

The Lord is gracious and full of compassion,
Slow to anger and of great mercy.
The Lord is good to all,
And his tender mercies are over all his works.
—Psalms 145:8, 9.

—A noteworthy feature of the page of congratulations which we publish elsewhere, is their ecumenical character. They represent not less than twenty states of the Union, and yet were selected without any reference to geographical considerations. They are entirely unsolicited, too, and are the more welcome for that reason.

—Our readers will be interested in the report of the Congregational Council, by Dr. Burnham, pastor of the Pilgrim Church in this city, a part of which we publish this week. Dr. Burnham apologizes for the hasty manner in which the report has been prepared, but we are sure our readers will be delighted with the contents of the report without taking special note of any lack in its literary form, and will join with us in thanking the Doctor for giving us so many of the notable and inspiring thoughts of this great council. The second and closing installment will appear next week.

—We have not infrequently heard the complaint made that preachers who have the better pulpits and better salaries do not appreciate the situation of others of the same calling who have to supply the weaker churches at a starvation salary, or abandon the ministry and seek other employment for a living. There may be some ground for this complaint, but it comes not of intent. The same lack of sympathy may be observed in all other spheres of life. Those who have good positions and good salaries are too apt to conclude that the condition of their less fortunate brethren is altogether due to some kind of inefficiency, deficiency or other personal fault. As this conclusion is only true in part, great care should be taken about expressing it, lest an arrow be sent through some innocent heart. Preachers who have always been fortunate in the way of a salary can afford to be compassionate toward their less fortunate brethren, who, perchance, may "be as good by nature and better by practice" as thamselves, especially in the matter of self-denial.

—To the rulers of the earth to-day we commend the advice of David, Psalms 2:10-12:

And now, ye kings, be wise,
Be instructed, ye judges of the earth!
Serve the Lord with fear,
And rejoice with trembling.
Kiss the son, lest he be angry,
And ye perish in the way;
For soon may his wrath be kindled.
Blessed are all who put their trust in him.

—Politicians hunt precedents; statesmen make them, especially when they confront an unprecedented situation, as in the Roberts case. "If a leper stood at the door of Congress it would not take five minutes, were his credentials ever so regular, to make a precedent by his instant rejection."

—As long as our weaker preachers press for the stronger churches and our stronger churches seek after the "cheapest man," there will be many misfits and much friction among the brethren. The question of pastorless churches and churchless pastors is a question of adjustment, very largely, and both pastors and churches should be equally interested in a "good fit." A pastor should no more seek a work for which he is unfit than should a church seek the "cheapest man." Both pastors and churches should also have due regard for the interests of others in the matter of salaries. Pastors should be cautious about bidding against a fellowlaborer for a given pulpit, and churches should have due regard for a man's abilities as well as his necessities, and vice versa. The interests involved are strictly mutual and their non-observance leads to many sorrows and failures.

—With the beginning of the new year the Christian Oracle announces that it will put on and ever after, for weal or for woe, wear a new name, "The Christian Century." This change of name is made in view of the greater things which it believes the new century has in store for the church and the world, and not from any expressed hope of itself becoming a centenarian, although we do not hesitate to wish for it such longevity and increased and prolonged usefulness. While we have no quarrel to make with the Christian Oracle about the new and greater issues of the new century, we are quite as fully convinced that it will be as dependent on the Christian evangelist for its proper development as has been the closing century, and we therefore do not propose to change our name. And should we, too, become a centenarian (journal) we ever hope to be abreast of the times, whatever the developments, and also ever equally true to the interestst of the Master's kingdom. All hail the new century!

—We recently received a copy of the Shanghai Daily Press, Shanghai, China, and with it some interesting news about our missionaries and their work in that city, which we reprint elsewhere in this paper. But our interest in the paper and the people from whence it came did not stop with its missionary news. One of the first things we noted in this paper was its numerous and large whiskey and beer advertisements, conspicuous among which was that of Anheuser Bush Brewing Co., of this city. What a shame that the gospel to these benighted people has to be followed up with such a river of deadly poison from a so-called Christian country! We were also surprised at the high prices charged for the necessities of life in Shanghai. The best anthracite stove coal, for instance, at $18 per ton and the Daily Press itself is $24 per year. One redeeming feature in the case of the coal, however, is that it is weighed out, when delivered, in the presence of the purchaser, which may make the article considerably cheaper than it appears on its face. But we have no apologies to make for the beer and the whiskey dealer, at home or abroad. They are the enemies of righteousness.

—Good books, like money, are hard to keep in circulation.

—Much as arbitration is to be desired as a method of settlement of international troubles, it seems to threaten us with a new danger if the settlement of the Venezuela trouble thereby is to become a precedent. The paper on which the speeches pro and con were printed is said to have weighed about twelve tons. At this rate arbitration literature would soon fill the earth.

—The Christian Guide complains that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and the Christian Oracle have not assisted in the effort to strangle the missionary unification movement which for some time has been gaining strength in the churches. It says: "We are always in favor of doing that which will be for the best interest of our general missionary work, but it seems preposterous to talk about changing our method at this time, when we have just witnessed by far the best year that we have ever known. There is an old adage, that we should let good enough alone, which we believe would apply in this case." Such a plea as this would put a stop to all progress. "Well enough" does very well only until you see something better.

—Of the Lord, with the Psalmist David, we can this day also truly say:

Thou visitest the earth and waterest it;
Thou greatly enrichest it;
The river of God is full of water;
Thou preparest their corn,
For so dost thou prepare it.
Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly,
Thou settest the furrows thereof;
Thou makest it soft with showers,
Thou blessest the spring thereof.
Thou crownest the year with thy goodness,
And thy paths drop fatness.
—Psalms 65:9-11.

—Our Washington (D. C.) letter this week, dealing as it does with some of the actual results and workings of the Anti-saloon League, becomes of special interest to our readers. We rejoice in the good work done by this league and believe that it has one of the features fundamental to the success of any work of this character, and that is a fund to employ competent men to devote their whole time to the interests and purposes of the organization. Mass meetings generate sentiment but they cannot be relied upon for siege work. Neither can an order of this kind do much field service, but it can furnish the sinews of war and put men in the field who can make it hot for the enemy year in and year out until they vacate the premises or are crushed under the weight of public sentiment and by the arm of the law. The work of the league in Washington and in Ohio shows that it can do aggressive work and we hope that its tribe may increase. We have not heard of such activity on the part of the St. Louis League, however, and had about concluded that it was not a very aggressive organization.

—Just as we close this paper we learn over the telephone of the death of C. M. Gilmer, of Quincy, Ill. Bro. Gilmer was a fellow student in college with the editor of this paper, and has been a pillar in the church at Quincy for many years. We have always esteemed him highly for his purity of life and his many estimable qualities. Our sypathies are extended to his family and to the church.

—Burris A. Jenkins, president of the University of Indianapolis, writes that on account of sickness he will be unable to furnish our readers with his usual Endeavor article this week. At the writing he was confined to bed with inflammatory rheumatism, which we trust has left him ere this time. He regrets the omission as will our readers, but they will accept the apology in all kindness and with sympathy.

—Having to go to press a day earlier than usual this week on account of Thanksgiving day we are not able to bring our evanelistic reports down to the usual time. We make this explanation for those who sent in reports of meetings that do not appear in this paper.

—Dr. Samuel A. Bundy died at his home in Marion, Ill., Nov. 20, 1899. Dr. Bundy was for a time a resident of St. Louis and became well known and greatly loved in the brotherhood of this city. Though in the employment of the government at the time, he did no small amount of work for the churches, and especially for the Fifth Church, which was then a mission. We regret to hear of the demise of Dr. Bundy and extend our sympathy to the bereaved widow and children. Dr. Bundy's funeral was conducted from the Christian Church in Marion; the services were conducted by J. J. Harris.

—A copy of W. J. Lhamon's handbook on "Heroes of Modern Missions," prepared for the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses recently came to hand and strikes us as a most excellent thing. How to get so much valuable information about so many of the heroes of the mission field in such small compass has certainly required no little reading, study and care. No one can read this small volume without a wide perspective view of the world's great missionaries, and the managers of the Bethany Reading Courses have certainly done the brotherhood a splendid service in having such a series of books written and published. And the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses are certainly the finest method for studying them yet attempted. We hope that the interest in these reading courses will become epidemic and these books reach the circulation which they so abundantly merit. Write to J. Z. Tyler, Cleveland, Ohio, for a copy of said book of the new series, and better still, for the regular reading courses, if you have not yet enlisted therein.

—We are always glad to have a letter from Bro. Lamar. Were it not for the invention of the printing press and the religious newspaper, it would be worth while to pass his letters around among the churches to be read in their public assemblies, so full are they of grace and saving common sense. He has reached that dignity of age and ripe experience, that catholicity of sentiment and of mature wisdom which give to his letters an encyclical character which belongs to those of few others. The only time we ever found it necessary to dissent from his conclusions was upon a question in which he was the innovator and we were standing for the "old paths." And now he comes forward, in the generosity of his heart, and heaps coals of fire upon our head by vouching for our orthodoxy when we are under fire! This is like the chivalry of his beautiful Southland, and it is especially characteristic of Bro. Lamar. What he says concerning a class of irreverent critics who would rob the Holy Scriptures of their sacredness and authority we can most heartily endorse. We are glad to believe, however, that no man among us, known as a critic, belongs to that destructive school. Some among us may, indeed, have accepted erroneous conclusions from which they may be compelled to recede in later days. This often happens to open-minded men who are only intent on knowing the truth. But, if this should prove to be the case, it would not show that they were disloyal to the Bible any more than if their views should come into universal acceptance; at last that fact would prove that we who were not equally prepared to accept them were disloyal to its holy teaching. Each of us must be loyal to the truth as he sees it, and as long as we are loyal to Christ we must exercise patience and charity toward each other. In this we are sure of the hearty acquiescence of our able and esteemed brother whose letter we commend to all our readers.

The Christian-Evangelist for 1900.

The year 1900 is the closing year of the century. We wish to make it the most memorable year in the history of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. A number of leading men have been engaged to write on the living questions of the day. An effort is to be made, both by improving the contents of the paper and by the liberality of our offers as well as by the hearty co-operation of our friends, to double the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST during the year 1900.

We shall make an announcement, soon, of writers and subjects for the coming year, which we are sure will be interesting to our readers. Meantime, see premium offers made elsewhere, and avail yourselves of these.

J. H. GARRISON, Editor.

—Kansas Christian College, Harper, Kan., now has an organ. It is called the College Outlook, and while primarily published in the interest of the Kansas Christian College it will attempt at the same time to represent the educational interests of the people in states and territory adjoining Kansas and also of the state of Kansas. The editors of the monthly journal are A. P. Aten, M. B. Ingle and S. S. Owen, to whom we joyfully extend the hand of editorial fellowship and wish the new enterprise abundant success. The college for which it stands began its work Sept. 4, 1899, in a beautiful and commodious building presented by the city of Harper and with a faculty of ten teachers, and the Outlook reports the college in a prosperous condition. It also says that a scheme is under consideration for the establishment of an industrial department that will be of great benefit to the future of the school. It contemplates the purchase of a tract of land in the vicinity of Harper, by the cultivation of which young men who are not able to bear the expense of an education may be enabled to pay their way through college; board, tuition, books and other necessary things being furnished in exchange for work upon the farm at stated times.

—The National Armenian Relief Committee through its secretary, Miss Emily C. Wheeler, 40 King St., Worcester, Mass., makes a plea for a Thanksgiving offering in behalf of 34,000 orphans now suffering from cold and hunger in Armenia. Remittances may be made to the treasurer, Brown Bros. & Co., 59 Wall Street, New York City. Twenty-five dollars will feed, clothe and instruct an orphan for a year.

—As we think to-day of the things for which some people can be thankful our hearts go out in sympathy for the poor, the unfortunate, the toiler, the burdened, the helpless and others. If in our power we could have no greater joy than to increase their occasions for gratitude. But since we cannot do this except in a very limited way, we can remind them of the blessings, real blessings, yet in their possession. You may not have houses and lands, chattels and goods, but you have your health, your loved ones, your home, your opportunities, and above all, access to a throne of grace from whence, after all, cometh every good and perfect gift. Remember that all the glory of man is as the flower of the grass and that better things than earth can give await the righteous in that better world. And that while a man may miss the good things of this life he can make sure of the best that is in the life which is to come. Then let us rejoice and be glad evermore. If God be for us who can be against us?

—In our Family Circle this week will be found numerous short articles and poems on Thanksgiving viewing it from many angles of vision. These articles have been selected from the best literature on our table and cannot be read without awakening the thanksgiving spirit in the heart of the reader. We also begin in this paper a serial story that promises to be one of the best, most interesting and profitable that has ever appeared in this paper. It is a religious story and has to do with the present and future of the primitive Christian religion. If you have friends in whom you are interested, in pure Christianity, in the unity of God's people, in their own salvation and in good literature, now would be a good time to have them subscribe for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

—The Foreign Society is arranging for a Silver Jubilee service, to be held in the First Christian Church, Louisville, Ky., on the 15th of December. This will be an all day service. The churches within a hundred miles of Louisville have been invited to attend. The Editor-in-chief of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST has been invited and expects to be present and to speak on the "Genesis of Society." He was present at the time of the organization. He has been closely identified with it ever since. Among the others who have been invited and expect to be present are J. A. Lord, of the Standard; J. J. Haley, of the Oracle; George Darsie; W. R. Lloyd; I. J. Spencer; Mark Collis; John Shouse, President Loos; President McGarvey; A. M. Harvuot; G. A. Miller; P. H. Duncan, and J. E. Pounds. The address of welcome will be delivered by E. L. Powell, pastor of the church. All the churches in Louisville will co-operate. It is expected that the 15th of December will be a high day.

A. MCLEAN.

—Barring the slight error in calculation of interest in the following from the Christian Alliance the facts ought to fairly startle every sane man. The question at the close of the paragraph is a pertinent one in the light of the figures quoted, and also of the facts, both included and implied:

In his speech at Chicago Pres. McKinley stated that the wealth of the United States was at least $65,000,000,000. Now is it fair to presume that one-half of this belongs to professing Christians, and one-half to the people of the world? The statistics of the country show that $2,000,000,000 are spent for whisky and tobacco every year. This is just six per cent. on $32,500,000,000, the half of the money belonging to the worldly part of the American people. That is, they spend six per cent of their entire capital for the service of the devil. Now how much of their portion does the other half give to evangelizing the world? Six per cent? No; if they did it would support FOUR MILLION MISSIONARIES, one to every two hundred and fifty people, in heathen lands, and evangelize the world in six months. The fact is, they spend less than one-fiftieth of one per cent.—about $6,000,000 a year for missions, less than one three hundredths of what the world gives for whisky and tobacco! Are we a Christian nation?

SLUGGISH INTELLECT

Caused By Coffee.

"Careful inquiry in the schoolroom developed the fact that those children who are habitually given coffee to drink have sallow complexion, are nervous, more or less irritable and very sluggish intellect or an overwrought and abnormal imagination, results of extreme nervousness. My own experience with coffee drinking kept me afflicted for some years with severe and constant headaches, with extreme nervousness at times.

"I was compelled to abandon coffee altogether and was quickly relieved of the headaches and other troubles. I was fortunate enough to secure a package of Postum Food Coffee, but my first attempt at making it was a failure. After another trial and following directions (which are very easy, by the way) I secured a delicious drink, far superior in my mind to coffee. I have continued to use it from the start and my improvement has been steady with no evil effects at all."

The above was written by a school-teacher, Miss E. Barnard, of Oxford, Kan.

It is an easy matter to leave off the coffee habit, if Postum Cereal Food Coffee is used in its place, particularly when attention is given to its proper preparation. The whole secret of the preparation is in allowing the Food Coffee to boil long enough to bring out the taste and food value.

All first-class grocers sell Postum.

PERSONAL MENTION.

Will G W. Moore, author of "A New Order of Service," published in our issue of Sept. 14th, please send us his address and oblige?

Christian College Chronicle reports 170 matriculates this school year. This, it says, is the largest attendance in its history. Seventy of the girls are now domiciled in the new building.

The church at Sharon, Pa., where C. C. Waite has recently taken charge, is the one of the oldest organizations in Western Pennsylvania, and reported to be in a prosperous condition.

Dr. W. T. Moore, dean of the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., is now in the field seeking to promote the endowment of that institution. Those who are interested in that work should correspond with him.

Any one knowing the whereabouts of Bro. Frank Beach, who preached at Clyde, Kan., a few years ago, will do a great kindness by sending his present address to Imri Zumwalt, Wilsey, Kan.

One of the largest meetings, counting additions, reported in our columns this week is that of J. V. Coombs, with the Prospect Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo.—126 additions to date.

Ami Fike is now preaching for the church in Peabody, Kansas, and reports conditions greatly improved. Thinks the Kansas State Board should send them an evangelist to hold a meeting, which we trust they can do.

Among those who called upon us last week in this office were F. G. Tyrrell, pastor of the First Church, Chicago, G. A. Hoffman, senior editor Register Review, Kansas City, and J. D. Dillard, field agent of the Orphans' Home.

George E Platt has begun work as an Episcopalian and H. W. Dale will become his successor at Marion, Iowa, about January 1. J. G. Encell having closed his work at Alburnett will serve in Marion as temporary pastor until January 1.

F. L. Davis, of Charles City, Ia., has been selected to preach the union Thanksgiving sermon in the Congregational church of that city. He will also exchange meetings with Chas. S. L. Brown, of New Sharon. The work in Charles City is said to be in a very prosperous condition.

W. H. Willyard, pastor of the church in Murphysboro, Ill., has published a book of 100 pages, entitled "The Divine Creed." It is a plea for the unity of Christians upon the Bible only. The book is carefully written, in good spirit, and looks toward the restoration of primitive Christianity.

C. J. Burton, of Canton, Mo., and M. R. Elder, of Pleasant Plains, Ill., visited Berlin, Ill., on Oct. 5, and assisted in the ordination of one elder and two deacons. It was church rally and roll-call day and was greatly enjoyed. Both of the brethren named are ex-pastors of the Berlin Church.

Jasper S. Hughes, author of "Mystery of the Golden Cloth," has recently published a small volume on "The Seer of Patmos, or John's Place in the Christian Economy." The purpose of this little book is clearly stated in its title, and will be a useful sidelight to the study of this unique apostle. Price of the book, paper cover, 25 cents.

"Uneasy Lies the Head That Wears a Crown."

But such are not the only uneasy heads. Overworked housewives, harassed business men, anxious teachers, ambitious students — all ages and both sexes are uneasy with aches, pains, impure blood, disordered stomachs, deranged kidneys and liver. For all such, Hood's Sarsaparilla is the effective and faultless cure. It infuses fresh life and health into all parts of the body through purified, vitalized and enriched blood. Try it.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Hood's Pills cure liver ills; the non-irritating and only cathartic to take with Hood's Sarsaparilla.

M. S. Dunning, who for three years has been preaching in Texas, reports 45 additions the first year, 55 the second and 75 the third year.

Homer T. Wilson, of Fort Worth, Tex., is expected to be in Davenport, Ia., early in December, and C. C. Davis, pastor of the Church of Christ there, has sent him an invitation to occupy his pulpit on the Lord's day. He is a man of national prominence among us, and chaplain of the national organization of traveling men.

E. A. Orr was installed pastor of the Christian Church at Harvey, Ill., Sunday, Nov. 19. J. H. Hardin, a cousin of Bro. Orr, presided at the installation services. C. W. Dean, former pastor, gave the hand of fellowship; J. H. O. Smith, the main address; Frank G. Tyrrell, the charge to the church, and H. L. Willett, the charge to the pastor.

The official board of the Church of Christ at Findlay, O., has published a sermon preached by their pastor, A. M. Growden, after his return from the Jubilee Convention. A copy may be had for a 2-cent stamp. It is full of facts on the church and will help inquiries concerning the church and its aim. Address Church of Christ, Findlay, O.

In the meeting reported this week by Jas. T. Hunt, Ellery, Ill., of the 66 additions reported a large number came from the Sunday-school, and we give the number that came from each class as he reports to us. This speaks well for the teachers in that school, as also for the officers and the pastor of that church. Read the report.

J. Z. Tyler will close his pastorate with the Euclid Ave. Christian Church, Cleveland, with the close of 1899. He announces his purpose to enter the general field at the opening of the new year to do evangelistic and institute work, doing the latter in the daytime and the evangelistic work at night. The subjects he will consider in the institutes will be "Bible Study," "Modern Missions" and "Our Plea for the Restoration of New Testament Christianity." Bro. Tyler is thoroughly competent for the "new vocation" as Bro. Willett calls it, of Bible teacher, and we are delighted to learn that he is going to enter this field. We trust the churches will at once arrange to secure his services. Correspond with him as to details.

Captain John R. Henry, of Indianapolis, Indiana, and Mrs. G. A. Wilson, of Collinsville, Illinois, were married at the Planter's Hotel, this city, on last Wednesday morning, according to the ritual of the Episcopal Church, by Elder Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Indiana. Captain Henry is one of the prominent men among the Disciples of Christ in Indiana, cashier of the State Bank, and a member of the Governor's staff. After the ceremony, the bridal party, about 20 in number, boarded Captain Henry's private car and left over the Vandalia line for Indianapolis. Bro. Sweeney spent the rest of the day visiting friends in the city, including those of this office, and to-night leaves for a trip into the northwest.

W. K. Homan has again come into the editorial and business management of the Christian Courier, Dallas, Texas. Late in the summer, M. M. Davis, pastor of the Central Church, Dallas, Texas, entered into an arrangement by which he became the business manager and Bro. Homan the editor of that paper; but finding the dual burden of church and press too pressing, Bro. Davis has left the press that he may cleave unto the pulpit, where we have no doubt he feels more comfortable and joyful. The Courier is again in the hands of Bro. Homan who is by no means a novice in journalism, and we again express our desire for the success of the Courier under his management.

F. M. Rains, the efficient treasurer of our Foreign Missionary Society, has, we are sorry to learn, suffered the loss recently of his only daughter, a child of 10 years, who was the light and joy of his home. We noted the shadow of this coming sorrow on the face of Bro. Rains during the Jubilee Convention. And this leads us to mention what had previously escaped our attention, that during the late convention a resolution was unanimously adopted, approving the plan of the executive committee of the Foreign Society to send Bro. Rains to visit the missions in China and Japan. We are glad of this arrangement, for it will give our brother a little surcease from his arduous labors, will better qualify him for his useful work, and will be a great source of comfort and strength to our mission stations in the countries mentioned While we extend our sympathy to Bro. Rains in the loss of his beloved child, we congratulate him on the privilege of this journey to the Orient, and assure him that he will be followed by the good wishes and the prayers of all the friends of that cause to which he has rendered such efficient service.

L. C. McPherson suggests that persons writing to Cuba should remember that so far as the post office is concerned Cuba is yet foreign soil. Letters weighing half an ounce requires five cents postage. If this is not prepaid he has to pay double for what is lacking. On some letters he has to pay as much as twenty cents. This is a burden that a missionary should not be asked to bear.

Bro. Northcutt, pastor of the church in Kirksville, Mo., has been assisting B. T. Wharton, the pastor of the church in Marshall, Mo., in a protracted meeting in that city, with good results. The Marshall Press compliments the preaching of Bro. Northcutt very highly, and also testifies to the good results of their combined work and of the future of the church. It says that the Marshall Church now has financial and moral power to "give it great influence in the state councils of that denomination," and thinks it lacking only in the matter of a state college such as other cities of Missouri, no larger than it, now enjoy. Perhaps the advice of these other cities on that subject might modify their views on the question of another state college or school, should they seek such advice.

Why We Are Thankful

Why We Are Thankful.

We give place here to extracts from a number of letters lately received, which we believe fall into perfect harmony with the spirit of Thanksgiving. These are only sample utterances from letters which come in every day. We should be less than human not to feel spurred up by them to do better work in the future than we have been able to do in the past.

"An Explanation and Statement," in THE EVANGELIST of Nov. 9, has just been read by me with great satisfaction.

Truly and fraternally,
J. Z. TYLER.

Cleveland, Ohio, Nov. 10.

I am very happy to know that you are in possession of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and are to continue to bring us the fruit of your ripe scholarship and experience. May our good Father spare you many years to lend influence and power in his kingdom.

J. G. WAGGONER.

Eureka, Ill.

I feel that I must also improve this opportunity to assure you how glad I am that you are to continue with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and that its policy is to remain unchanged.

W. M. FORREST.

Ann Arbor, Mich.

I congratulate you on the settlement you have made with the stockholders, especially because the principle of liberty you have so long contended for is conserved. Without any reservation I am delighted that matters are settled. CHARLES A. YOUNG.

University of Virginia.

I have thought for some time that I would express to you my hearty approval of the position you took in the past and now occupy I am quite sure that all your writings have tended to more firmly fix my faith in the Bible as the inspired word of God, and increase the charm of the Christian religion, which is the expansiveness of the truth upon which it rests. Raised as I was in the Presbyterian faith, circumscribed in my religious thinking by the boundary lines of the creed of that church, I may, possibly more than some others, have a higher appreciation of the liberty of thinking than otherwise I would have had.

H. S. GILLIAM.

Maysville, Mo.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow." I this moment learned of the result in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST matter.

ALBERT BUXTON.

Waco, Tex.

I most heartily congratulate the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST regarding the triumph of liberty in the crisis it has passed. F. M. CUMMINGS.

Cuyahoga Falls, O., Nov. 14.

I rejoice that we are not to lose your work on the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, that you are to continue in charge of its editorial management. Pending the recent changes my heart and my judgment have been with you and your attitude. I have rested in confident faith that the Lord and his people would bring to pass the right things. HOWARD C. RASH.

Salina, Kan.

I predict for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, if good business management prevails, a more prosperous ten years to come than the past ten years have been. L. C. STOW.

Grand Rapids, Mich.

Your editorial on "Radical Conservatism" is timely in thought, spirit and composition. It is a strong presentation of an important subject. Your position is the only safe position. I appreciate the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST more with every issue. SHERMAN HILL.

Hampton, Ia.

I am among your host of friends who are glad that you are to continue in the editorial management of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. From the earliest publications that were merged into this paper I have watched the course you have taken and whether always agreeing with positions taken by you or not, I have always had confidence in your Christian loyalty and have sympathized with the broad Christian charity with which you have treated questions in controversy.

May God continue to bless and prosper your great work in the future as he has so abundantly done in the past.

W. P. AYLSWORTH.

Bethany, Neb.

I rejoice to know that you are to continue editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The first rumor of your resignation sent a chill through my frame. You have helped me so much. I have not always agreed with all you wrote, but I want to know what really gives additional light and praise God for these men who have the time and ability to read, study and write out their thoughts. Your exaltation of the spirituality of our churches is the right banner to carry. I try to follow it in my work.

E. A. COLE.

I am overjoyed at the news contained in this week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST I congratulate you in achieving what I consider a great victory in behalf of our liberty in Christ. I wish to renew my pledge of helpful support. Long life and success to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. May God's grace attend you.

CHARLES M. SHARPE.

Lawrence, Kan.

Let me assure you that none will rejoice more heartily than do your friends in the East, that arrangements are perfected whereby you remain at the head of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. We need the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, where it is editorially, and need it very much in these times of change. F. W. NORTON.

Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Some of your "opinions" may be right or they may wrong, but I receive more inspiration for work, and more spiritual uplifting from your writing than those of any other man I know of. So may the Spirit guide you to true opinions, and may the Father spare you many years to wield the pen. H. F. BARSTOW,
Pastor Hickory Church.

Hickory, Wis.

I am so happy to know that you are to continue with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST "There is a divinity that shapes things." God bless you always. JAMES N. CRUTCHER.

First Christian Church, Paris, Tex.

A thousand congratulations to the paper that J. H. Garrison is editor of.

FRANK H. MARSHALL.

Hermason, Tex.

Kindly allow me to congratulate you on securing full control of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The man who has made the paper a power in the religious world is the proper man to continue the work. LESLIE N. COLLINS.

Shelbyville, Ill.

I have just learned of the happy termination of the difficulty and that you are to remain with the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. Thank God that this is so! I trust the Christian Pub. Co. will prosper in every way.

For whatever little it may count I am with you mind, heart and strength.

BARTON O. AYLESWORTH.

Fort Collins, Colorado.

I have just read, with great gratification, your "Explanation and Statement" in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST of the 9th inst. I feel a high degree of genuine and personal satisfaction in the present outcome of the whole matter, and I have large confidence in the future outcome I congratulate you that the anxiety and uncertainty are ended, and I trust and pray that the approval and abundant blessing of the Father in heaven may confirm you that the whole matter is as he would have it. Mrs. T. joins me in congratulations.

A. J. THOMPSON.

Louisville, Ky.

I wish to congratulate you upon the amicable adjustment of the recent difficulty as regards the attitude of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST to the higher criticism. I hope that its former position will in no wise change I am in entire accord with your position and it is my firm conviction that that position represents a rising star. GUY HOOVER.

Minerva, O

We as well as you are to be congratulated upon your retaining the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST We felt that it would be a great mistake as well as a misfortune, for you to sever your interests with one of the very best and most valuable periodicals in our great brotherhood. God bless you Go on We believe in your loyalty to the CHRIST, the great solar center of all faith and truth A. M. HOOTMAN.

Tonawanda, N. Y.

I am so delighted at the news in your editorial "An Explanation and a Statement" in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST of the issue of the 9th, that I hasten to say so I have always looked upon the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST as pre-eminently your work—your monument; and I hope you may continue its editor as long as you shall live It is our strongest and best paper and must be made better and better.

S. T WILLIS.

New York City.

Having read your statement in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST this morning, wife and I have had a season of rejoicing to think that you are still to have control of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. It is to me a great triumph for the right, for free investigation and above all for the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. I have always supported in my weak way all of our papers, and I do not now wish to enter into any invidious comparisons, but I must say that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is nearer my ideal of a high toned religious journal than any paper on earth.

H. M. BROOKS.

I have read your "Statement and Explanation" with a great deal of interest. I congratulate you upon your successful adjustment of all difficulties. It is needless for me to say that I am delighted to know that you are to continue as the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I think that the whole brotherhood are to be congratulated upon the fact that you are to be continued at the head of our best paper. F. M. CALVIN.

Milwaukee, Wis.

Have just laid down the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST after a two hours' perusal and study and words fail me in attempting to express my appreciation of its sweet and pure Christlike spirit. "Evangelists and Evangelism," the "Easy Chair," "In His Steps," "A Great Sermon," etc., are particularly helpful articles all ablaze with Christian zeal and enthusiasm. And how it could be possible for any man in this political age to conduct the "Current Events" department of such a paper as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, with more fairness and impartiality, seems to me, a thing impossible. But enough; I know you are overwhelmed with correspondence, and I am surprised beyond calculation when I try to realize how much you have accomplished and are still accomplishing in the Master's cause. J M. SPRINGER.

Carthage, Ill., Nov. 16, 1899.

I have just read your editorial in this week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST "An Explanation and Statement," and we wish to congratulate you upon the happy settlement of this unfortunate affair. May God greatly bless you in your labors and prosper the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as never before! You have had our deepest sympathy and shall have our heartiest cooperation in maintaining the high standard of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in its great mission of usefulness to the cause of primitive Christianity. We have all faith in the editorial management of the paper.

OGLE AND DUTCHER.

Mexico, Nov. 11, 1899.

I cannot express too much gratitude for the revelation given in your editorial last week showing that you will remain as editor of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST In all candor I want to say that this is the work of the Lord and will redound to the blessing of the brotherhood and the great plea for which we stand. The closing paragraphs of your editorial are inspiring. May the Lord give you many years in the service for which you are so pre-eminently qualified. G. W. MUCKLEY.

I have read your editorial in this weeks' CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on "An Explanation and a Statement." I congregatulate you on the outcome. I hope and pray that the Lord may spare you many years to continue the work you have done under such trying conditions, and yet a work that must be done for our people. CHARLES M. FILLMORE.

Carthage, O.

I am glad the suspense is over, and that the matter of your future connection with the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST is settled as it is. Your editorial of the 16th inst. breathes the Christian spirit. May God direct you by his wisdom, and may you be instrumental in the accomplishment of still greater good.

B. H. SMITH.

Canton, Mo.

As the rumor first reached me, it was that you had resigned the editorship of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. I rejoice to find, from your own pen, that you will still remain at the helm. And I hereby venture to express to you personally what I have always and unfalteringly expressed in conversation with others, my unbounded confidence in your unswerving loyalty to the Lord Christ, and my admiration for the fair and generous discussion permitted in your columns concerning all that pertains to truth.

GILBERT E. IRELAND.

We are rejoiced to learn from this week's issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST that you will still continue to be its editor. For years we have read your paper, and prized it especially for the clear presentation of truth and sweet spirit of Christian love manifested in its editorials.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Sadness filled my heart, wife's and son's when we learned you had tendered your resignation of your editorialship of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. We felt sure it would be a great loss to this great religious journal But, to night we received the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST of Nov. 9th, which gave the cheering news of your retention. I felt to say: Thank God for this news You are doing a great work. God bless you, Go on. You have our sympathy and the benefit of our prayers. May God be with, bless and sustain you in your ardious work.

R. H. BOLTON.

I have just read your "Explanation and Statement" and want to say it is gratifying to me to learn that you are to continue as editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST You are making it the best paper in the world to me. I believe in you. I read every thing (almost) you write and always with profit and a spiritual uplift. You have my sympathy and confidence and I pray God's blessing and guidance upon you The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has done a great and good work for the plea we all love; but I believe its greatest triumphs are yet to be won

J. H. FILLMORE.

Cincinnati, O.

I note with much satisfaction the settlement of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST matter, and am glad as you, of course know, that you remain with that paper Another victory has been won for the Disciples. Our people have their faces turned in the right direction after all

F. L. MOFFETT.

Centerville, Ia.

I have just read with pleasure your "Explanation and Statement." I feel sure that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will have even more friends than it has had in the past, and that its power for good will be greatly increased. The crisis through which both paper and editor have just passed, will endear them to their friends an hundred fold

ALICE CURTICE MOYER.

Salena, Kan.

I was gratified to note in your last issue that the misunderstanding had been adjusted, and that you were to remain at the helm of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST I shall give the contribution of an honest effort and kind words to churches for which I labor, and seek to enlarge the circle of your readers. F. A. MAYHALL.

Vandalia, Mo.

I am very much gratified that you still remain in charge of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I should regret to miss the sweet messages from the "Easy Chair." In your kind and gentle and generous dealings with all, you have won my love and deepest respect. May you live many years to lead and guide the loyal Disciples of Christ. MRS. R. D. SHANNON.

Warrensburg, Mo.

I have watched with no small interest the trial through which the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST as much as yourself, has been passing It is with gratitude that I note the final adjustment The interest of the Master's cause must have suffered if arrangements had been otherwise. I have during the past few years always admired your open and frank and above all Christian and manly manner of treating men, as well as subjects that became matters of discussion in the columns of he CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I believe the present trial through which you have just passed will strengthen in love and confidence the editor of he CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST among the Disciples Trust that the new associates with you may prove pleasant co-laborers, and profitable to the work

Correspondence.

Letter from Bro. Lamar.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—Just before leaving for our Georgia convention I was delighted to read in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST that the troubles in which the paper and yourself had been involved were all settled in a sweet and Christian way. This would be matter of congratulation even if it extended no farther than to the parties immediately implicated. But in truth it reaches out to the whole brotherhood. Its influence upon the great work which they are doing and the sacred cause which they are maintaining is of the very deepest significance. As I contemplated the divergence and the influences leading up to it—perhaps it was my timid fears, perchance it was my sober commonsense that made me dread it as—

"The little rift within the lute
That by and by will make the music mute
And, ever widening, slowly silence all."

In any case I felt that your departure from the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, which you had conducted with such signal ability, and converted into so powerful an engine for good, could be nothing less to us than a serious calamity.

That you have often been misunderstood is what happens to us all. I know that in my own humble sphere and way I sometimes say or write things that I afterwards deeply regret. I say them with reference to local conditions and special wants, honestly believing that they are good for the object immediately before me, and that they will do good. Later on I discover that with many of my readers they meet no want; they are liable to misconstruction and their circulation would, therefore, be harmful. And it is because I understand myself in these respects that I have always understood you. I did not need your distinct announcement of principles as set forth in the article alluded to to satisfy my own mind of your unreserved and hearty devotion to Christ and the Holy Bible, and to all that this great brotherhood, with which you and I are identified, are consecrating their best energies and most willing sacrifices. Your public and private life, your established and honored character, the purity and heartiness of your Christian sympathies, the direction and abundance of your labors, and above all the masterly defence and advocacy of our plea for apostolic Christianity, absolutely precluded any other thought from my mind. As to the higher criticism which is kept so prominently and, as I think, altogether too prominently before us, I presume that upon a careful comparison of notes there would be very little difference between us. Indeed, among any number of our sober, thoughtful, well-balanced minds you will find no difference worth making a fuss about. We all believe in freedom and we mean to exercise it. It is our God-given right and no man shall deprive us of it. It is the declaration of independence, handed down to us from our fathers. It is our "Old Glory" under which we have marched to victory and renown, and palsied be the hand that would strike it down!

Again, we all thankfully accept, appropriate and enjoy the matured results of reverent and scholarly investigation. Our people are not medieval peasants nor backwoods clodhoppers. They expect more light to burst forth from the Word of God, and they are waiting and ready for it.

The gratifying thing with me is that all of us whose opinion is worth a groat are a unit upon these points; and if this constitutes us higher critics, the last one of us belong to that class.

I am not, however, entirely ignorant of the fact that there is another class of men, some of them learned and brilliant, who are masquerading in the character of higher critics, when in fact they are simply special pleaders. They settle the case before they investigate it, and then, like a paid attorney, bring it before the jury in the most fascinating, powerful, one-sided and delusive way, with every favoring fact unduly emphasized and most prominent, while every opposing fact is either kept out of sight altogether, or else belittled and ridiculed into insignificance and contempt. These are the flaring comets of the critical universe, astonishing heaven and earth with their singular heads, which are thought to be very light, and their shining tails which are known to be very thin; and some people think as they see them splurging through the tenuous ether that the whole solar system and the stars of heaven are about to be knocked into everlasting smashes. But you and I can testify that they never have been yet. Instead, the garish comets themselves soon pass away, as Carlyle would say, "into the depths of infinite space" and eternal night. What I hate is to see some little two by three fellows, who had read a little, and dreamed a little, and swelled a little, attaching themselves to one of these tails, and assuming to look down with arrogancy and contempt upon Arcturus, Orion and Pleiades—despising the serene old stars that rained their sweet influence upon Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and that gladdened the hearts of the very Christ and the twelve apostles. But I am happy to say that so far they have not hurt either the stars or the planets—much! The sun is still the center of the solar system—the Lord be praised; and if we can only manage to keep him there, the orbital movements of the heavens and the light and life of the world are not likely to be soon changed. We all know, of course, that the Bible is safe, and the church is safe, and the Lord is safe; but what are we to do with those aimable, well-meaning but indiscreet young men—fascinated by these catchy fancies, and as full of them as they can hold; nay, fuller than they can hold, for they are slopping over everywhere, in season, out of season? Would you suggest a cold bandage around their heads, or a good warm spanking somewhere else? Any remedy will do if it only brings them to realize that the exercise of unlimited freedom calls for the possession of at least a little sober common sense. It is better for them to know now than to discover later that our great brotherhood are not going to follow the ignis fatuus lead of any man, great or small, who would conduct us away from Moses and the prophets and from Christ and the apostles. As for you and me, my dearly beloved brother, we can have neither thanks nor honor for those who are artfully and perpetually insinuating doubts as to the supernatural elements in our holy religion—the supernatural, whose pervading presence is the very life and power of it all. Take away that, and we have a religion without God, faith without a basis, prayers without meaning, life without motive, and at last, death without hope. As for myself—and I would not be writing this horrid letter to you, if I did not feel sure of our perfect and heartfelt sympathy—I am old and ready to die. All the interest I have in this world—all that I have in any world—is invested in that old Book. In this bank are treasured all my drafts upon eternity. May God save it from the drills and the dynamite of the burglars who are seeking to destroy it!

I set out, my dear Brother Garrison, simply to write you a personal letter of congratulation. It has grown, I perceive, into considerable length, breadth and thickness, though having probably very little weight. It was not intended for publication, but if you can see any probable good that might result from it, it is, of course, at your disposal. And may the blessing of the Heavenly Father rest upon you.

In the love of the truth and for the glory of its Author, Your brother,

J. S. LAMAR.

Grovetown, Ga., Nov. 18, 1899.

School Teacher's Headache.

It's not a new variety of headache. It's the old pain consequent on conditions which result from study, confinement, and careless eating. It is only one symptom of a derangement of the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures headaches by curing the diseases which cause them.

"I was troubled with very frequent headaches, often accompanied by severe vomiting," writes Miss Mary Belle Summerton, of San Diego, Duval Co., Texas. "Bowels were irregular, and my stomach and liver seemed continually out of order. Often I could eat almost nothing, and sometimes absolutely nothing, for twenty-four hours at a time. I was entirely unfit for work, and my whole system seemed so run-down that I feared a severe sick spell and was very much discouraged. I was advised to try Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and did so with such satisfactory results that before finishing the third bottle I felt perfectly able to undertake the duties attending public school life, and contracted to do so. I most heartily advise those suffering with indigestion, and its attendant evils, to give this great medicine a fair trial."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets keep the bowels healthy.

New York Letter.

The exhcange recently arranged for in the pastorate of the Brick Presbyterian Church in this city is one that comes nearer the idea than any we have noticed in many years. Dr. Van Dyke, who resigned to accept the chair of English Literature in Princeton, presented his resignation to take effect whenever a suitable successor could be selected. The church asked him to suggest the most available man to follow him in this work, which he did, naming the Rev. M. D. Babcock, of Baltimore. The Brick Church board and Dr. Van Dyke joined in commending the Baltimore minister to the congregation, who unanimously extended him a call, and sent a delegation to Baltimore to present the same and show cause why it should be accepted. The result is, Dr. Babcock decided to come to the New York field. Dr. Van Dyke will continue as pastor until he can do so, and the church is united and happy. There has been no candidating and there will be no vacancy in the pulpit—practically no break in the work. The whole affair speaks well for all who have anything to do with it. But how different the situation in the Fifth Ave. Presbyterian Church, where for two years they have tried to agree on some one to become their pastor.

Two of the oldest and most widely known Congregational pastors of Greater New York have resigned within a few days. Dr. Samuel H. Virgin for twenty-nine years pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, 121st St. and Madison Ave., presented his reignation recently to take effect at the end of the year. There has been some friction in this congregation, but all that has ceased, so that perfect harmony now prevails. Dr. Virgin said a young man is now needed to do the necessary work before the church. The character of the community has so changed that aggressive measures are necessary in order to permanent prosperity.

Dr. R. S. Storrs, for fifty-four years pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, has just resigned on account of failing health, and doubtless will be made pastor emeritus for the remainder of his life. Dr. Storrs is the only pastor this noted congregation has ever had, and has carried on this heavy work without an assistant or helper all these years. He was one of the founders and for thirteen years an editor of the Independent. His people say there has never been the least discord between him and his church. Though Dr. Storrs has always been a public-spirited man he has always refrained from discussing current topics and political issues in the pulpit. He chose not to express his opinions on these matters in the pulpit, but always through some other channel. In this Dr. Storrs showed wisdom by which many other ministers might profit. Christ sent us to preach the gospel. If this is faithfully done the greatest factor in the solution of social and political problems will be supplied. Dr. Storrs' great work in Brooklyn is an inspiration to all Christian men who knew of it.

A number of Disciples of Christ in Newark, N. J., and vicinity met at the Y. M. C. A. parlors in that city on Nov. 14th to consider the beginning of a missionary work in that great center of population. About fifteen men and women decided to undertake the work of establishing a Sunday-school and prayer-meeting service, looking toward the establishment of a church. It was thought best not to organize a church at the first, but let that come as a natural consequence of successful teaching and preaching. There are perhaps as many as thirty good Disciples who will affiliate with this movement. Doubtless there are many others whose names and addresses are not known to us, but who will be found in course of time. If any who read these lines know of Disciples of Christ living in or near Newark, ann will kindly drop me a line, or write E. L. Kelland, 24 North 7th St., Newark, N. J., informing us of such people, they will thereby help along a good work. Newark is a city of more than 200,000 people and should have been entered with the simple plea of the Disciples of Christ long ago. The cause must be planted in Newark with all speed. The prospects seem fair for a good church in that city in a few years. So may it be.

We had the pleasure recently of a visit from Bro. John L. Darsie, who came in the interest of Hiram College, which is making a strong effort to increase her endowment to $250,000 by the end of the century. The college will be fifty years old next March, and as 1900 will be the jubilee of the institution, by general consent Hiram is to have the right of way in the privilege of appeal. This seems to be appropriate. Hiram by her noble work has earned the right to ask for a larger endowment, that she may do a better and larger work. Our colleges are at the very foundation of all our missionary and church success. The church and the mission field demand broadly educated men, and in order to equip the men properly we must have schools with adequate facilities. The question of an educational secretary was not satisfactorily settled at the Cincinnati convention and will come up again. Why would not this plan work: Let the Board of Education select a field secretary, and let him devote all his time to the best interests of our schools. He could devote one year to the endowment of one college, and the next to another, and so on all around until each had received one year's work; and let the institution for which he might be laboring pay his salary for that particular year. This scheme, it seems, would tend toward unifying our educational work, and it would give all an equal opportunity. What does the editor think of this suggestion? What do others think of it?

Los Angeles Letter.

Let me in the beginning of this letter express my great delight in learning from the last number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST that J. H. Garrison is to continue as its editor. I know of few greater calamities that could have come to our cause than his removal from his present influential position as editor. Under his direction its pages have always breathed the spirit of the Master. Its columns have never been closed to the hearing of any new truth. It has always pleaded for liberty. It stands for all conservative progress, fearing nothing but error, always defending the gospel of Christ. May its light never grow less!

During my recent sojourn in the East two delightful books of the Christian Publishing Company fell into my hand and very materially contributed to my pleasure during the long hours of travel across the plains that intervene between Los Angeles and the Mississippi Valley. One of these books is entitled "Men of Yesterday," and was written by Thos. W. Grafton, the popular pastor of our Rock Island Church. It consists of short biographical and character sketches of Walter Scott, Barton W. Stone, John Smith, Isaac Errett, Barton W. Johnson and O. A. Burgess, with an introduction by Benjamin L. Smith. It came at an opportune time when our minds have been turned to the fathers from whom we have received such a delightful inheritance. All these men are entitled to the loving remembrance and gratitude of our brotherhood, and I rejoice that God has put it in the heart of our brother to embalm their memories in this excellent little volume. It is written in good English, in pleasant style, in fairness to the characteristics and work of the men and is worthy of a place beside the author's Life of Alexander Campbell, and should be in every library that aspires to do justice to the men who have played a conspicuous part in our church history.

The other book is called "Esther." It is the gist of a series of sermons on the book of Esther and was written by one of our most successful preachers, M. M. Davis, of the Central Church, Dallas, Tex. This book is one of a series on biblical characters published by the Christian Publishing Company, and consists of recitals in their order of the different parts of the book of Esther with such lessons as the author desired to emphasize. There are several intetesting features about this book: First, it is in an important series now being published; second, it is a splendid little book to put in the hands of young people, who ought always to be supplied with good reading; third, it affords an interesting study on methods of preaching. M. M. Davis is a success as a preacher. Certain elements have contributed to this success. If these elements can be discovered and appropriated by other preachers, then that much good has been done the cause. Every preacher who desires an active part in the ministry of our brotherhood ought to be a student of the methods adopted by successful preachers. These methods are often revealed in books of published sermons. This book affords an opportunity for such study. Fourth, it shows how attractive and interesting the Bible may be made, obviating the necessity for the preachers to hunt for them outside the Word of God I have learned that large throngs of people were interested listeners when these sermons were delivered. W. M. Taylor, one of America's greatest and most successful preachers, did much of this kind of preaching.

This leads me to say that I have just been reading a book of W. M. Taylor's on "The Parables of our Savior." It consists of a series of twenty-eight expository sermons on the parables, delivered one winter in the Broadway Tabernacle in New York. It is the work of a master of expository preaching. In his kind of expository work W. M. Taylor had no peer in the American pulpit, not at least in published sermons. England affords his equal along certain lines in the person of Alexander McLaren, whose work is a combination of the textual and expository. Taylor's book on the parables is an effort to popularize so as to present to a mixed congregation the distinctive truth in each parable. I have found very little to criticise in his effort. In fact, I pronounce the effort a most unqualified success. I have thought, What a magnificent series of sermons, of a splendid variety, the parables would make for any pulpit. Who will try a series on them and report success? This book is published by the Armstrong Co., of New York, and may be had for $1.75, and is well worth the money.

Another book that fell into my hands during my recent trip was "The Teaching of the Books; or, The Literary Structure and Spiritual Interpretation of the Books of the New Testament," a work of collaboration by H. L. Willett and James M. Campbell. Willett we all know. Campbell is the author of "After Pentecost, What?" and other interesting books. Prof. Willett prepared the part of the book on Literary Structure, while Dr. Campbell set forth the Spiritual Teaching of the Books of the New Testament. The work of Willett is characteristic of the man—scholarly, concise, comprehensive. Some of his position, as usual, would not be indorsed by a conservative scholar. In the main his work would be unobjectionable to any. Campbell's teaching is excellent. Altogether it is a delightful and helpful book, in many places throwing fresh light on the Word of God. In many ways it is superior to Dean Farrar's superb work on "The Messages of the Books." The two books taken together would make quite a complete presentation of the New Testament books, and would be intensely instructive and helpful to any Bible student.

Washington (D. C.) Letter.

Some five months ago there appeared in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST a strong editorial entitled, "A Union of Temperances Forces," in which the author calls for some practical plan by which there can be a united attack for the suppression of the saloon. He asks: "Can we not have a temperance organization so comprehensive in its scope as to include all who are opposed to the liquor traffic and who are in favor of all wise and practical methods looking to the control of its manufacture and sale? Who will show us how such union can be effected."

In the Anti-saloon League we have the answer to the editor's question. Its aim is a federation of the churches, temperance societies and other moral forces of the community, county and state, to enact and enforce the laws of the state against the saloon.

The platform of the league contains only one plank: "The saloon must go." This one plank is wide enough to hold a great number of people of diverse opinions and affiliations. The organization is omni-partisan; as Democrats, Republicans, Prohibitionists and Populists work shoulder to shoulder for the one great object. It is interdenominational, while the Disciples of Christ and the United Presbyterians form the advance guard. (So says, E C. Denwiddie, of the National Society.)

Representatives of all the religious bodies are found in the ranks and are doing valiant service. Among the 80,000 inhabitants of Cambridge, Mass., there is not an open saloon. This delightful state of affairs, which has existed for twelve years, is said to be due to the federation for "this one thing" of the Protestants and Catholics and Jews. D. N. Beach, formerly of Cambridge, now of Minneapolis, testifies:

We have wiped out the lines between creeds. Our Catholics and our Protestants meet on one platform, they organize the campaign, they speak in the same places. A Catholic has repeatedly drafted our 'Clergymen's Address to the Citizens," and has presided at our most distinguished gatherings, and each election night, when the bells are rung to sound out for our side and for the country around, our victory, the three foremost bells to join in the symphony turn over and over in Catholic, Trinitarian and Unitarian belfries. There is something glorious about this!

There is nothing in the constitution to exclude non-church members or agnostics or athiests, though I have not heard that the latter were helping to any extent.

It is not necessary that one should be a teetotaler to become a member. A man may help himself from the decanter in his buffet and still be willing to aid in suppressing the saloon at the corner. Even the poor inebriate is given a chance to strike back at his arch enemy.

The Anti-saloon League of the District of Columbia, organized June 23, 1893, was the pioneer society. Its record during the six years of its existence shows the possibilities of united and persistent attacks upon the saloon.

In 1893 there were 1,144 applications for liquor licenses, of which number 939 were granted. In 1899 there were 663 applications, of which 631 were grantad.

While the population of Washington is increasing, every year the number of saloons grows beautifully less. The closing of 278 licensed places in six years is a record of which our league may well be proud. These results have been accomplished only by a prodigious amount of labor. There ar affiliated with the league 66 church societie 36 temperance societies and seven other or ganizations. A week's anti-saloon revival held every fall, and the third Sunday in October is observed as Temperance Sunday.

More than 150,000 pages of literature have been distributed, an attorney has been sustained for six years, attending the sessions of the Excise Board, giving advice and assistance to residents and property owners, keeping watch on the proceedings of Congress and helping along all good prohibition measures.

The Ohio Anti saloon League, though a few months younger than that of the District of Columbia, has surpassed this splendid record of the parent organization. During the four years previous to the organization of this league the saloons had been increasing in Ohio at an average rate of 468 a year—an aggregate increase for the five years ending July 1, 1893, of 2,340. Since 1893 not only has this increase been stopped, but there has been an actual decrease to the extent of 1,564 saloons. Allowing 25 feet frontage to each saloon, this would be equivalent to over seven miles solid frontage of saloons.

The league raises as much as $30,000 a year for its work, which enables it to employ an office force of eight and keep fourteen "reputable, scholarly and tactful men in the field, giving their whole time to the work."

The results of the recent election in Ohio have called attention to the growing power of this organization. The record of Judge John A. Caldwell, Republican candidate for lieutenant governor, was such as to cause him to be bitterly opposed by the Anti-saloon League. The result is that he ran 40,000 votes behind the head of the ticket, and at this writing his election is still in doubt.

The Cincinnati Enquirer, which is not a pro-temperance paper, says: "The election returns show that the Anti-saloon League must be reckoned with in the future as a factor in state politics." And Chairman Dick, of the Republican committee, is quoted as attributing Caldwell's loss to the effects of the Anti-saloon League:

I never saw a better or a more systematic canvass than the league made against Caldwell. They fought him in every church, and almost from door to door. They kept it up to the last minute of the campaign, and the result is not altogether a suprise to me.

The Enquirer tells us that two other candidates were made the targets for the league's ammunition. Of these the representatives for the legislature from Sciota County pulled through by a narrow margin, while the candidate in Mahoning County was beaten.

The representative in the last Ohio Legislature from Greene County was anxious to become speaker of the House. To further his chances he worked in the interests of the brewers. The league sent 1,400 letters to Christian Temperance people in his county showing his record. The result was that he was beaten at the primaries 873 votes and a good temperance man now fills his place.

My space will not permit me to tell of the effective work done in thirty other states in which Anti-saloon Leagues have been organized.

The American Anti-saloon League, organized in 1895, has opened headquarters in this city and will conduct along national lines the work which has been so successfully prosecuted in the states.

The prospect of a successful season's work in the national capital was never brighter for our people than at the present time. Evidently, there will be no reaction from the enthusiasm of the Jubilee Year. Our delegates returned from the Cincinnati convention profoundly impressed with the power of the simple gospel of Christ and determined to make that power felt during the coming months.

The four congregations united in a two weeks' series of meetings, which proved exceedingly profitable in deepening the spiritual life of the people and bringing the members of the various churches in closer fellowship. The closing service, under the auspices of the Endeavor Societies, was especially helpful. It was decided to make these union services a permanent feature of our work in Washington.

The gift of the Whitney Avenue church property, valued at $7,000, and the supply of a preacher for this mission by the C. W. B. M., came so suddenly that the Washington Disciples are only beginning to realize their good fortune.

Ira. W. Kimmel's work there is surpassing all our expectations. In the past two weeks he has baptized thirteen, of whom eight were men. He has organized a C. E. Society with sixteen and a Junior C. E. with forty-six members. On Lord's day there were 175 present at Sunday-school. The church membership is now forty-nine.

A Just Decision of a Judge. William J. Long, County Judge of Thayer County, Neb., gave the following as his decision on an important question of the day. The judge thus expressed his views: "I have used Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer in the family for about twenty years. We have raised thirteen children, and never paid a doctor bill, except for the setting of a broken limb which the Vitalizer could not set. It meets, however, all other emergencies, and wife says she cannot keep house without it." So far for the learned judge. We also take pleasure in endorsing his statement as we have heard frequent mention of the merits of this remedy.

Kansas City Letter.

This city has just witnessed a week of religious services which, for attendance and deep interest, is almost without precedent in its history. Mr. D. L. Moody came to Kansas City for a campaign of eight days, beginning on Sunday, Nov. 12th. Our churches and preachers generally were united in the effort to reach the great unchurched population of our community, as well as to revive the zeal of the membership. The meetings were held in our great Convention Hall, which will seat fifteen thousand people. The first two meetings, on Sunday afternoon and night, drew crowds that could not get into the hall. During the week the audiences were very large, often filling the vast auditorium. Mr. Moody spoke at every service until Thursday night, at which time it was observed by those nearest him that he spoke with great difficulty. That night he was very ill, and unable to continue his labors. He started for his home, in Northfield, Mass., on Friday evening. The meeting went on, with some diminution in attendance. Mr. R. A. Torrey, of Chicago, Mr. Moody's assistant in the Bible Institute there, came Saturday morning, and preached the remaining two days of the union meetings, which closed with large audiences and deep interest.

Mr. Moody preached in his usual manner—simple, plain, practical talks, which could not fail to accomplish good. Some things he said which "we" do not believe, and some things he omitted which "we" would have said, and by just that much I think his message was weakened, for I have an abiding faith that the gospel is presented by our wisest preachers in the most scriptural and powerful way that the world has known since the days of the inspired apostles. It was delightful to hear Mr. Moody plead with sinners to forsake their sins and accept the Savior, declare the willingness and power of Christ to save every one who would accept him, urge the duty of faith, repentance, confession and complete submission to the divine will. It was painful to witness his studious avoidance of all reference to the ordained act of submission, as preached and practiced everywhere by the apostolic ambassadors. He mentioned baptism but once, and then only to declare that a man might be baptized and yet not be a Christian. True, of course, but why not also tell the people that, according to the teachings of Christ and his apostles, the man who wished to become a Christian would embody his purpose in that culminating act? Nevertheless, I believe that good has been done by Mr. Moody's visit, and Christ has been received into some hearts that were before strangers to his love, and therein I do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

Mr. Torrey while a better speaker than Mr. Moody, did not reach the hearts and consciences of men so powerfully, and his unfortunate record as a convert to the doctrines of the notorious Dr. Dowie, of Chicago, made his words, of necessity, of less effect. While the papers have reported several hundred "conversions," it remains to be seen what the results are, for this estimate is nothing more than the footing up of the numbers of those who have arisen for prayers, or to declare their purpose of following Christ, in all the meetings, and in these there are many duplications, no doubt. How many will unite with the churches it is impossible to estimate.

Meanwhile, at the South Prospect Christian Church, Bro. J. V. Coombs, of Irvington, Ind., has been preaching every night for four weeks, to audiences that often taxed the utmost capacity of the building. He has taught the church its duty to live humbly and faithfully before the Lord, and has pointed sinners to the way of salvation with such success that many have joyfully turned their feet into the path of life. Up to Sunday night there had been 126 additions, most of them by confession and baptism. There will doubtless be others to unite before the meeting closes, which will be on to-morrow evening. Thus does God honor the faithful preaching of his Word. Bro. Coombs is a forcible speaker, and has won the esteem of all our people by his manly bearing and strong proclamation of the truth. The South Prospect Church is now ready for the work of a good pastor, and ought to secure one immediately, that none of the fruit of this revival be lost. It was a grief to the pastors of Kansas ity to have Bro. E W. Thornton leave that field, but we are hoping that the Lord will send a worthy successor to carry forward the work.

By the way, our evangelists are coming to write books Bro. Coombs has a little volume entitled "Campaigning for Christ" which I have examined with pleasure. It tells how to prepare for and conduct a revival, with ample instruction as to the fundamental truths which need emphasis in the average community. Bro. A. W. Conner, also of Irvington, has a little book out of which I have been permitted to read. It is entitled "The Boggs Boys," and is a simple story of how an earnest man wrought a moral and spiritual reformation in a church and community by his own fidelity. Many friends of these brethren will be pleased to send for a copy of their productions, no doubt.

A beautiful volume has just reached my table, from the press of the Fleming H. Revell Company, which bears the title, "Some Latter-day Religions" The author is our own Bro George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Sixth and Prospect Church, of this city. It is a series of sermons on the modern religious cults, such as Pessimism, Materialism, Spiritualism, Mormonism, Theosophy, Faith Cure and Christian Science. Bro. Combs is master of a rare literary style that makes it a delight to read anything he has written, while these sermons bear ample evidence of the thoroughness of his research and the candor of his treatment. The volume is destined to do great good in helping those who have not time for study into the original sources to gain accurate knowledge of the central principles in these strange isms, and at the same time to perceive their fatal weaknesses. It ought to have a very wide circulation.

I am receiving so many letters of inquiry concerning matters with which I have only indirectly to do that correspondence is becoming a burden, both as to time and expense. May I ask brethren who write me for information or assistance to not forget to enclose a stamp? Occasionally one is thoughtful enough to do this, but the most forget. I am glad to grant any favor in my power for my brethren, but would like to have them relieve me somewhat of the expense of serving them.

A Reading Room in San Juan, Porto Rico.

Bro J. A. Erwin has rented a house which is used both as residence and as a meeting-place. He writes: "There is no place in San Juan for the young men to go to spend their leisure time except the vile saloons in the city," and that it is his purpose to open a reading room in his house, where there will be kept the church papers, the various magazines and other choice literature, with which to win young men from the saloons. The Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry is located in San Juan and there are a great many soldier boys who can be won by an attractive place of this kind.

It is our desire to assist Bro. Erwin in the establishment of this reading room. We will be very glad indeed to receive subscriptions to our church papers and to the leading magazines to be sent to this reading room. Any of our church papers can be sent for one dollar a year, some of the magazines can be sent for one dollar a year, others at two dollars a year We shall be very glad indeed to receive subscriptions, and we will select the magazines or papers and have them sent at once tn Bro. Erwin.

Don't postpone sending, but write at once, saying that you will send to that reading room one or more magazines. To avoid duplication, please send the money to us, and we will select the magazines.

If any of our friends have books that they would care to donate to such a reading room, and will send them to us, we will make up a box and send them to Bro. Erwin

New England Echoes.

We were denied the great pleasure and blessing of attending the Jubilee Convention. But we have read with much interest the various reports regarding the same. Doubtless it will prove a great blessing to the work of the Disciples of Christ in the world. The power of this rapidly growing religious body must and will be felt in the world.

It is now being recognized as a leading body of Christian people, and its influence will be realized more and more, as the days go by, in all the world.

Restoration of primative Christianity in faith and practice, and a re-establishment of oneness among the people of God is the great plea providentially entrusted to us as a people. May we ever prove worthy of this trust. While we were not permitted to attend the great convention of the Disciples of Christ we enjoyed the pleasure of attending gatherings of other religious bodies in and around Boston.

Both the Christian Adventists and Free Baptists recently held conferences in our city—Chelsea. Both religious bodies appeared to be earnest and consecrated Christian people, and both somewhat progressive, but not a tithe equal to the Disciples.

The Moody meeting, held in Tremont Temple, Boston, where Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of England, J. Wilbur Chapman, Moody and others spoke. Morgan is a host within himself. The services were edifying and soul-uplifting.

And we, too, enjoyed attending the sessions of the state convention of the Y. M. C. A. Good work is being done in behalf of young men.

The general convention of the Universalist Church was of interest. Some of the leading spirits plead strongly for Christian piety and spiritual worship. Their prayers and Bible readings and addresses appeared in no way different from the common churches of our land.

The 33d annual state convention of Young Men's Christian Associations of Massechusetts and Rhode Island was held in Lowell, Mass., Oct. 26-29, 1899.

We were sent as a delegate from Chelsea. It was a large and enthusastic convention.

Dr. R. A. Torrey, of Chicago; W. C. Douglass, of Philadelphia; Anthony Comstock, of New York City, and others from abroad were present and rendered most excellent service.

According to reports good and effective work has been done to save the youg men.

Good work is accomplished in the colleges, and effective work is done in behalf of railroad men.

On Lord's day, Oct. 29th, the city pulpits were occupied by delegates who came to the convention.

New Bedford, Mass., was chosen as the place for holding the convention one year hence.

While in the "Spindle City," Lowell, we were the guest of Bro. Willis and Elmer Farnham.

With those young men we were well acquainted while in the state of Maine. They are well-to-do young gentlemen, with whom we enjoyed our sojourn. Lowell is a great cotton manufacturing city, having a population or about 80,000.

The Universalist general convention was held recently in the Second Universalist Church building, Boston, Mass., where Hosea Ballou served as pastor from 1817 to 1852.

We attended several sessions. The representatives many were persons of culture, talent and eloquence. A large proportion of the delegates were women, some of whom were ordained ministers

They arranged to raise a "20th Century Fund" of $100,000, which will be a benevolent church fund.

Their religious services of songs, prayers and addresses were characterized with much earnestness.

They have a church discipline which was overhauled and made a new "Statement of Principles," which are as follows:

1. The Universal Fatherhood of God.
2. The spiritual authority and leadership, of His Son Jesus Christ.
3. The trustworthiness of the Bible as containing a revelation from God.
4. The certainty of just retribution of sin.
5. The final harmony of all souls with God.

Speeches portrayed the fact that there is but a shade of difference between the Unitarians and Universalists.

After hearing and seeing for ourselves, we were of the opinion of the old Quaker. At the the close of the service, a Universalist preacher wished to know if he should return and preach for the congregation. There was a pause. The silence was broken by the Quaker who rose and said: "If thy doctrine be true we have no need of thy preaching for us; and, if it be not true, thou need not come, as we need not that thou should preach a lie."

In the death of Elder Horace L. Hastings, October 21st, the Chrtstian world has lost one of its most earnest students, preachers and writers. Elder Hastings lived in our own city—Chelsea—for many years; but, of late years, was located at Goshen, Mass., on a large farm which he was utilizing. Bro. Hastings was widely known as the editor and publisher of the Anti-infidel Library, and the Christian. Besides these he published unnumbered tracts and pamphlets on religious and kindred subjects. He was a merciless opponent of infidelity. He ably defended the claims of the Bible, and was a strong and eloquent expositor of its teachings. He has preached in the chief cities of both sides of the Atlantic. But he has fallen! His widow and sons will continue to publish the Christian. Hence, his work well begun goes forward—though dead yet he speaketh.

A great field for harvesting lies open before us. Most churches have pastors from whom we expect good reports in the near future. Princeton and East Machias, Maine, as well as Manton, R. I., are pastorless, and possibly the Lubec Churches, in Maine, but we hope not.

The pastor, Bro. Harry Minnick tendered his resignation, but we hope he will change his mind and remain.

We need to be more fully consecrated to the work, and enjoy more of the infilling of the Holy Spirit.

If churches and ministers are fully the Lord's and God works through them, in the promulgation of his truth, what can hinder our forward movement?

Yours in the work,

R. H. BOLTON.

A Good Report Through Faith.

Some facts drawn from the report of our state evangelist at the West Point convention.

No doubt but that other brethren that attended this convention and heard this report enjoyed it as much as myself, but knowing our state evangelist as I do, and also knowing how bashful he is when it comes to reporting his own work, and how modest and unassuming he is in all his efforts to show what he has accomplished in the state for the brotherhood, I will give the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a few facts that I think cannot be excelled by any one. This report covers a period of nine years, and is as follows:

Bro. Jno. A. Stevens came to this state as its evangelist January, 1891. At that time our state had about 23 preachers and a membership of about 4,500. At the expiration of nine years we have organized between 45 or 50 new congregation, with an increase of membership of about 5,000, and an increase in the preaching force of about 20. So now we have in round numbers about 9,500 or 10,000 membership, with a preaching force of about 43 preachers, which is a gain of over 100 per cent. during the past nine years. Our church property has also been increased to the amount of about $36,600, for there has been bought or erected 35 buildings. And another grand fact in this report was that there isn't a disruptured church or a church broil in the whole state. What harmony, what peace there is existing in this beautiful South state of ours. I don't think we have a preacher in the state that isn't ready and willing to assist our state evangelist in every way possible. So you can see at once that we have this great work at heart, and are in touch with him. Not many states can boast of a more harmonious brotherhood than Mississippi. I have been in the state since 1892 and have missed but one convention since that time, but must say that I think this was the most encouraging report I have ever heard read in the state. I know some of the difficulties that our evangelist encounters and the obstacles to be surmounted. I have been preaching up and down the Southern Railroad, from Greenville to Columbus, for the past seven years, and know what work must be done, and I can safely say that in my knowledge of the work John A. Stevens is the right man in the right place. I don't think we could find another man that understands the people of Mississippi like he understands them, and I think from that report he read we ought to keep him in the field. Bro. Stevens was unanimously elected for the tenth time, which shows how much the brotherhood think of him.

Cincinnati Letter.

The recent exciting contest for prestige in this state, politically, is now enough in perspective to view its lights and shadows somewhat. Cincinnati deserves the congratulations of the country, in that she has unrolled another cycle in the the de-volution of her "old man of the sea," her Tweed, Boss Cox. One and one-half years ago she deprived him of a large portion of the city patronage by electing a "Fusionist" mayor, but he managed to retain control of the Hamilton county's purse strings. At this election the "Fusionists" rescued that $100,000 per annum from his grasp by scoring a victory over his gangsters. Mr. Cox was powerful enough with the large Hamilton county delegation in his hands to compel the big chief, Hanna, to come to compromise on state nominations, and it is freely rumored that the price is to be Mr. Foraker's senatorial shoes.

THE "CONSPIRACY OF SILENCE."

The most remarkable thing of this remarkable Ohio campaign was the vote polled by Samuel M. Jones, the "Golden Rule" mayor of Toledo. Without newspapers, with few helpers on the stump, with no party organization whatsoever, he polled more than 100,000 votes, carried his own city and county, but most wonderful of all, overwhelmingly carried the city of Cleveland and Cuyahoga county. Even Mr. Hanna's ward went with the landslide. His vote there was more than Nash's and McLean's combined. The reasons therefor are that the people of Cleveland heard him oftener and knew him better than those elsewhere. His public meetings surpassed those of any other man upon the stump in size and effectiveness. Great crowds greeted him everywhere, and his campaign is only surpassed by that of Mr. Bryan in '96. Wherever Jones spoke there was the largest Jones vote polled. The press of each party early received a letter from their respective state central committees asking them to take no notice of Jones, not to advertise his meetings or report their success. He spoke to 25,000 people in Cincinnati one day, and not one of the partisan papers mentioned it. But the last ten days brought the captains out of their tents, all guns were unlimbered and enemies joined ranks to do battle against this champion of the people. Democrats proclaimed him a Republican and Republicans asserted he stood for Democratic principles. Every old political scarecrow was redressed and frantically waved about. The "conspiracy of silence" was broken and thousands slowly filed up to the ballot-box with the dearly beloved old party ticket. The Jones vote was largely drawn, from Democratic ranks, and Mr. McLean is very disconsolate because of what "might have been."

THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE'S HAND.

Mr. Caldwell, the Cincinnati ex-mayor and Nash's running mate, felt the heavy weight of another new factor in politics, that of the Ohio Anti-saloon League. Finding him worthy of their attention, this comparatively new organization demonstrated their most practicable policy by puting their interdict upon him, and he barely escaped defeat. Their plan is to put the "taboo" upon liquor sympathizers regardless of party.

OUR RELAPSE.

We are now in the midst of the time when by all the laws of nature we should be suffering from a relapse in church work after the high tension of convention days. But there are few signs of any such thing, unless the postponement of the Ohio Day offering be such. Accessions to the churches are reported at every Monday's ministerial meeting, and signs of a great winter's work multiply.

It is Wise Economy to Use Good Soap. Our Soaps are sold entirely on their merits, with our guarantee of purity. Thousands of Families Use Them, and have for many years, in every locality, many in your vicinity. Ask us for your neighbors' testimonials.

AFTER 30 DAYS' TRIAL, if the purchaser finds all the soaps, etc., of excellent quality and the premium entirely satisfactory and as represented, remit $10; if not, notify us goods are subject to our order. We make no charge for what you have used.

If you remit in advance, you will receive in addition a nice present for the lady of the house, and shipment day after order is received. Money refunded promptly if the Box or Premium does not prove all expected. Safe delivery guaranteed. The transaction is not complete until you are satisfied.

☞Many boys and girls easily earn a "Chautauqua" Desk or other premium free, by dividing the contents of a Combination Box among a few neighbors who readily pay the listed retail prices. This provides the $10.00 needful to pay our bill, and gives the young folks the premium as "a middleman's profit." The wide success of this plan confirms all our claims.

THE LARKIN SOAP MFG. CO., Larkin Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

See Notes Below. Established 1875. Capital, $500,000.

From Christian Uplook, Buffalo.—We have bought and used the Larkin Soaps a number of years. It has always proved entirely satisfactory. The premiums are all that is claimed for them. We wonder that the Larkin Company can give so much for so little. They are perfectly reliable.

NOTE.—The offers made by the Larkin Soap Mfg. Co., as above, are most generous. The terms are such that no fair-minded person can object to. We know the firm. Members of the staff of this paper have purchased and used the soaps, and are glad to say that everything is as represented. The Soaps are excellent, the premiums wonderful.—Herald and Presbyter, Cin., O.

A Word from Holden, Mo.

We are delighted to know that Bro. Garrison will remain with the CHRISTIAN-EVNGELIST. Many such expressions have come to me.

The church here is in very good condition, with some modifications. Among the good things to mention are the general increase in our Bible-school since the close of summer; the general splendid attendance at Sunday services; the work being done by the ladies; the interest in the Junior Endeavor, the more than usual interest and work in the greatly improved physical condition of the minister. But not all is bright and smooth. There are no frictions anywhere in our field known to the minister, but so many indifferences, which sap all spirituality. But by faith and prayer and study seek to be prepared for my work, and endavor by constant visiting, with personal work, to silence some unruly tongues; to steady some fantastic toes; to burn many cards; to break a few jugs; to show people the dignity of being truly Christian, and the glory of it, thus turning many from sin unto Christ.

O that the Spirit may lead us all till we can say, "Blessed is the Lord, my strength, which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight; my goodness and my fortress; my high tower and deliverer; my shield, and he in whom I trust; who subdueth my people under me" in the way of Christ.

In finances we are doing better than ever, but not good enough yet.

Church Dedication.

The beautiful new church at Cowden, Ill., will be dedicated on the third Lord's day in December. Elder S. M. Martin, of St. Louis, will preach the dedicatory sermon. Contiguous congregations are cordially invited to be with us. We especially desire the neighboring pastors to be with us, and also to bring as many of their congregation as will attend. Visitors from a distance will be provided for.

W. BEDALL.

Dedication.

On Lord's day, Nov. 19, the Berean Christian Church at Brazil, Ind., was opened for public worship and dedicated. It was an occasion of great rejoicing. The day was a beautiful one, the audience large, the giving generous. All debts were provided for, and the church put on a good firm footing.

The house was needed for the part of the city where it is located, and the church rejoices in the prospect of doing a great work for the Master. This makes 503 houses of worship that we have dedicated, and there are more to follow. We will remain and protract a meeting.

Who Will Take Shares?

Under the above heading, last week, I called for partners in the work of supporting the man in Southwest Missouri. I wrote him what I was trying to do and here is part of his reply: "Your kind letter came to hand in due time and I was glad to hear from you again. I appreciate your kind offer, and it came in the nick of time, for I was just about ready to accept the call to Washington Ave. But I feel such a deep interest in this mission field that I will gladly accept your proposition, for my heart fairly aches when I think of leaving this barren field. True, the thought of work where I could be with my dear wife and babies every day was a mighty temptation, and only the thought of the good I could do in this needy field gave me the strength to resist, but with this in mind I will rejoice in the sacrifice I am making. Meeting here 13 days old and 19 added. May God bless you."

Brethren, a man who has this spirit, the very Spirit of the Lord, deserves our hearty support. The record still stands, T. A. Abbott, $10. Who will be the next?

Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Oregon Notes.

Our meeting was a grand success in every way. Bro. and sister Webb are thoroughly consecrated to their work and their sweet songs are a great power in bringing souls to Christ.

We are going to have a mortgage burning here soon. The mortgage which has been hanging over the church since it was built, seven or eight years ago, amounts to more than $400. This money is all pledged and now due. With this debt wiped out we look for a very successful year's work.

The following facts about Bro. and Sister Webb's work as singing evangelists we believe will be greatly appreciated by our brethren:

Geo. A. Webb and wife began their work as singing evangelists in December, 1890, with H. C. Patterson, of Neosho, Mo. They have led the song service in 56 revivals in the past eight years Many of these meetings were in Missouri, Iowa and Illinois. In May, 1894, they came to Farmington, Wash., and assisted C. F. Goode.

The following September they began work with Evangelist J. W. Ghormley, who is now pastor of the First Christian Church, Portland, Ore. They labored together for nearly three years in Washington, Idaho and Oregon, holding 17 revivals with an average of 41 additions to each revival.

Bro. and Sister Webb have worked in nearly every church in Washington and Oregon. They have had almost steady employment. Since beginning this work they have never stayed from work but one night on account of storm and cold, and one night each on account of sickness. During this long siege of hard work their voices have never failed them.

In December, 1891, they assisted M. L. Rose in a short meeting at Melbourne, Ia., and again in February, 1896, at North Yakima, Wash., and now this November, 1899, they again assist Bro. Rose at Eugene, Ore. In December they go to Eastern Washington to assist G. F. Stivers in a number of meetings. Their home is in Portland, Ore., 411 4th St. Any pastor or evangelist wishing to hold a successful meeting should call these consecrated workers to lead in song. May God spare them many years in this their chosen work.

Ministerial Relief.

This cause now presses forward for our attention. The third Lord's day in December or the first available Lord's day thereafter is the time set for taking this collection.

We ask ministers and interested members of our church to send for as many of our last reports as can be used to an advantage, distributing them among the brethren and sisters. This ought to be done a week or two before the day set for the collection.

We believe that a mere reading of the reports, with such favorable consideration as the minister can give in his sermon, will lead to generous offerings.

Relying on the merits of this work, we appeal to the generosity of the brotherhood to help the worthy aged and helpless.

THE GENERAL FUND.

The General Fund which we use for paying for relief is languishing. We ask the churches and individuals to divide their gifts so that the General Fund shall receive its share.

Last year we were able to pay the annuitants on or before Christmas day. Can we not do the same this year?

The time is short in which to prepare this work. It should be done quickly. If from any cause the collection must be temporarily postponed, do not forget it entirely.

THE MEMORIAL FUND.

The Atkinson Memorial Fund has increased generously since the Cincinnati Convention. Several ministers who pledged nominal sums at the Jubilee Convention, returned home and have obtained generous contributions. The outlook of this fund is very bright. In many cases the pledges are being paid before maturity.

We ask all those who read this article to write for our reports and help take an offering for this cause.

From the St. Louis Pulpits.

One man may be what the world calls great; he has genius, wealth and power, but you discover that through all his life he was controlled by purely selfish considerations; he endeavored to live for himself; he neither feared God nor regarded man. You cannot give him your respect But here is another man, poor, in humble circumstances. You find that he chose to remain so, on account of what he believd to be his responsibility to God. Instinctively you do honor to him.—DR. NICCOLS (Presbyterian).

People lavish money on themselves with a prodigality that has rarely been equaled, but dole it out in pitiful sums to God and his cause. All this shows that the love of the world is controlling them more than the love of God, and that Mammon is enthroned in their hearts instead of Jehovah."—DR. CANNON (Presbyterian).

It is important that men should be brought to a consciousness of sin. There should also be brought to men a revelation of their possibilities and of their divine sonship. So Christ saw man in his true value, because in his true relation.—BAXTER WATERS (Christian).

When a man comes to Christ as a sinner he is not perfect. He comes to be purified and trained. And Jesus sees all the bad there is in him, with his grand possibilities.—Dr. HOLWAY (Congregationalist).

If we are to succeed in our ministry there must be positiveness in our preaching. Without this, both in teaching and in character, there will bs a fearful deficiency. Negatives amount to nothing until you add the positive quality. Yet we can never have this element of strength without conviction and courage and faith. We must speak what we know bravely and with confidence, otherwise our utterances will be lame and helpless.—DR. DUCKWORTH (Episcopalian).

A passion so universal as the love of power must not be indiscriminately denounced. It is good or bad, according as it is controlled by moral law or left to its own wild will.—DR. BREMON (Episcopalian).

"The Divine Creed," by W. H. Willyard, Murphysboro, Ill., proves to be a hit. One sister purchased 14 copies for distribution among her religious neighbors. Buy a copy. It will do the work. It has 101 pages, two excellent charts and a cut of the author. Price, 30c; four copies, $1.00. Address the author.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

The school at Sumner is making progress amid difficulties—for the church is burdened with a debt—and it demands all the sacrifice possible on the part of the membership to meet it. Miss Flo E. Waugh is making the school most efficient for good, while J. B. Jeans is doing any and all work to further the kingdom of God. During his protracted meeting he put in the days making a baptistery, doing all the work.

Triplett is one of the schools that always seems glad of something better, and I have no work his fall that gave me more pleasure. May God bless them for it. J. W. Davis is on his fourth year with them, while old-time friends, like A. W. McWilliams and his Christian wife, are faithful to God throughout all adversity

At Wheeling our institute opened most favorably. Like many others this school has suffered by removals, but Geo. R. Dimmitt, J. H. Robinson and Ed Littrell are seeking to make up all such deficiency by new enlistments and better methods. H. F Ritz is one of the Canton boys that honor the instiution and its sacrificing faculty by such work as he is doing. The offering to state Bible-school was very generous.

Meadville is quietly forging to the front, and those who thought it unadvisable to organize the school are now glad their judgment did not prevail. Our membership there is not large, but zealous. The one prime need to rapid progress is a church house, and since seeing their great success I sincerely believe it will come. Our dear Brother R. B Harvey had no Bible school advantages in early life, but has not missed a session of this school since its organization, reflecting very strongly on those affirming themselves too old to attend. He and Sister Harvey, the Creasons, Van Arsdalls, Evanses and Ridings will yet make themselves felt in the work of the Lord at Meadville. The school met its apportionment in full, and Bro. Walton is promptly paid at every visit.

The Sunday school Times, beginning with 1900, will give us graded lessons on the International Lessons, including the Primary, Junior, Intermediate and Senior This will be another advance step for them, while our brethren have been at it for sometime, but saying nothing. But with all your getting, do not leave out the Times for front rank methods in this work.

This is our final opportunity to urge that you do not forget Girls' and Boys' Rally Day for America. We should seek to do as much for home as we do for the foreign field. Why not? Indeed, why not do more? for in the end it will enable us to do more for the other. Keep the entire day, and with such service and offering as will honor God and bless many portions of America.

In your official changes for the coming year let no Missouri school nominate the superintendents in open session, but select a committee of wise and experienced workers, who will prayerfully consider the material, choosing for this important position those capable of the very best work possible. Do not leave the selection to the notion of the moment, for it means too much to the school and its efficiency. Consider the interest of the school, not the whims of the pupils or the giggling girl.

Will all bear in mind that I am out in the field, holding institutes, while wife is doing the office work? And you must bear with us if we are sometimes tardy in replying where it cannot come directly, and will be out until Christmas. Then, too, please remit us "that thou owest God" in this good cause.

A New Chapel in Yangtsepoo.

On Thursday evening a small but admirably appointed church was opened on the Yang tsepoo Road in connection with the Foreign Christian Mission. An exceedingly modest edifice, Mr. James Ware the well known evangelist is mainly respossible for its raison d' etre. For some canside rable time Mr. Ware, whose labors in Tsungming, Tungchow and the vast population bordering thereon, as well as in Pootung, have been deservedly recognized, has been working in Yangtsepoo in the interest of the poor country girls and women employed at the various mills. Temporary premises proved insufficient for their needs, and with the assistance of friends he was at length enabled to inaugurate what should prove a most valuable aid to the reformation and Christianizing of a great, and to be feared, wofully ignorant community. The church will accommodate about 400 communicants, and by reason of its situation, in the center of the cotton factories and mills, cannot help but make largely for good. The opening was accompanied by a short service, after which short addresses were delivered by various well-known divines. Rev. W. P. Bentley congratulated all concerned on the establishment of that additional means of spreading the gospel and incidentally remarked that it was a day for congratulation for the Foreign Missionary Society, insomuch that in the 25 years of its existence it had been enabled to accomplish so much that was good and lasting. He was particularly gratified to see the establishment of a branch in Shanghai, which they could only regard as the metropolis or gateway of China's vast empire. Rev. Dr Farnham delivered a brief address, eulogizing the valuable work accomplished by Mr. Ware, whilst Rev. Dr. Muirhead also spoke with his customary enthusiasm, hailing with pleasure a new means of disseminating the truth. Mr. Ware then gave a short report of the work of the society in China, particularly as relating to the outports, and the many troubles and difficulties they had been called upon to surmount. He observed that when they first came to labor in Yangtsepoo they found that there was so much antipathy expressed towards them as would be expected in the heart of China. In 1895, however, they secured rooms opposite the paper mills where they opened day schools, and after obtaining a little congregation they baptized a few men and women from the mills. This place became too small, and two years later they got possession of larger premises opposite the cotton ginning mills, where their congregation increased to such an encouraging extent that they found they would be compelled to build premises of their own, and the building in which they were assembled that day was the outcome of that resolve. They opened with a membership of 35, while they had 43 scholars in the day schools, embracing the Niaopo and Shanghai dialects and hoped in the near future to see this branch of their work very considerably extended. The meeting closed with the doxology. Among those present were Rev. C E Darwent, Dr. Barchet, Mr. J. Matheson, Mr. R. Kahler, Mr. A. W. Danforth, Mr. T. Weir, Rev. G. Loehr, Mr. E Evans, Rev. Dr. Farnham, Rev. Dr. Muirhead, Rev W. P Bentley and others.—The Shanghai Daily Press.

Massillon, Nov. 20.—Four were baptized here last Wednesday night, and three more additions yesterday.—F. H. SIMPSON.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, Nov. 20.—One confession at our last night's service in the Adams St. Christian Church; a gentleman, the head of a family.—T. H. BLENUS.

ONTARIO, CANADA.

Inwood, Nov. 20.—Ten nights with nine confessions; six men and three women. Bro. David Dick, a student of St. Thomas College of Disciples, has charge of this new point.—R. R. BULGIN, evangelist.

IOWA.

Des Moines, Nov. 20.—East Side Church meeting a week old; 17 added, 12 last night.—LOWE (pastor), LANDRUM (singer).

Keota, Nov. 20.—Meeting still continues. Five added to date. Interest deepening.—GEO. C. RITCHEY (pastor), C. E. SMITH (singer).

MISSISSIPPI.

Water Valley, Nov. 18.—Am in a second meeting here for this year. My first meeting closed in July, with 54 additions. When I began that meeting we had but two members in the city, which has 7,000 population. Up to date in the present meeting, of less than two weeks, I have had 32 addition. Have had 23 additions in last 36 hours. The big tent is overflowed every night, or nearly so.—JOHN A. STEVENS, state evangelist.

INDIANA.

Evansville, Nov. 20.—Seven added here yesterday. The Scoville-Houston meetings have proven a blessing to this city. The seed which was sown during those meetings is now bearing fruit. The Bethany Church is largely the result of a revival meeting, and although some have fallen away, yet the great majority have proven faithful. God bless the evangelists.—W. A. BELLAMY, pastor.

Rolling Prairie, Nov. 20.—Meeting two weeks old last night, and 16 accessions. The prospects are good.—MILO W. NETHERCUTT, pastor.

Delphi, Nov. 21.—With Miss Pearl Perrin assisting as singing evangelist we held a short meeting here, with 10 additions. Miss Perrin is an excellent helper in a meeting.—W. G. SMITH.

Muncie, Nov. 21.—We have closed at Winchester, with 16 additions; five by baptism. I begin this week at Windsor, Ill., and then go to Nebraska for two meetings.—A. MARTIN.

Wabash, Nov. 20.—The meeting at Poseyville was an exceedingly good one; 19 confessed their faith in Christ. Bro. G. W. Ford is the hard-working and successful pastor at Poseyville.—L. L. CARPENTER.

Terre Haute, Nov. 19.—Two confessions at the 2nd Church of this city. The outlook for the church here is very encouraging.—THEO. J. FREED.

MISSOURI.

Memphis, Nov. 20.—We are in a meeting here with P. O. Powell as helper. Seven accessions yesterday; six by confession. We enjoy the presence of Bro. Powell for his rich spiritual life and its influence.—GRANVILLE SNELL.

Chillicothe, Nov. 20.—Four additions yesterday; 12 since Jubilee Convention, six by confession. We began a meeting yesterday. Our audiences are good.—LAWRENCE F. MCCRAY.

La Monte, Nov. 20.—Meeting continues with interest unabated; 24 additions to date, 22 by confession.—KING STARK.

Springfield, Nov. 20.—Meeting one week old with five confessions. There is a fine interest, deep and spiritual. We are hopeful.—D. W. MOORE.

Kansas City, Nov. 20.—Twenty-nine accessions yesterday; 33 accessions Sunday before; 62 in two days; 126 to date.—J. V. COOMBS.

Barnard, Nov. 22.—Our meeting closed the 16th with 14 confessions; 28 in all. Bro. Cottingham went from Barnard to Union Church, near St. Joseph, and the writer began a meeting under the district board at Bedison. Meeting is one week old; three added by letter. The interest is good, but the weather has turned against us.—F. E. BLANCHARD.

Galena, Nov. 20.—We closed a two weeks' meeting last night with 23 additions. Greatest interest at the close. J. H. Gaylor, of Springfield, is a true Christian; we have all learned to love him since he has been with us.—O. SCOTT.

Independence, Nov. 21.—I have just returned from Appleton City, Mo., where I assisted Bro. Elmore, pastor of our church there, in a meeting lasting over three Sundays. The results were 22 baptisms, two by letter and one by commendation. My visit among the people there was in every way most pleasant, and I found in Bro. Elmore a man with whom it is easy to co-operate in gospel work.—JAMES VERNON.

KANSAS.

Mound Valley, Nov. 20.—We are in the midst of a glorious revival. The meeting is one week old with 10 additions.—J. P. HANER.

Caldwell.—On the evening of Nov. 18th I closed a 14 days' meeting in Flint Schoolhouse, Grant Co., Okla. It was a grand meeeting with 14 additions by obedience and two reclaimed.—C. E POMEROY.

Englewood, Nov. 20.—Began here last Tuesday night. Have preached five sermons and had four additions. To continue until near Thanksgiving. No church here; hope to establish one —F. H. BENTLEY.

Hutchinson, Nov. 18.—I had the pleasure of preaching for the church at Hutchinson, Sunday, Nov. 17; seven added, two confessions. Bro. D. Y. Donaldson, of Butler, Ky., takes charge of the church Jan. 1st.—ELLIS PURLEE, Stafford, Kas.

Hill City, Nov 21.—W. R. Gill, of Salem, commenced a meeting Thursday evening of last week. He is a very able minister. Have good audiences and fine attention. Bro. D. S. Thompson, formerly of Norcatur, took charge of the work here, as pastor, in September. He is young in the ministry and a fine man, and with such we are sure to gain in strength and in numbers. We have never had a house of worship of our own, so we are trying to buy the Congregational church. It is a nice, large stone building. Pray for success in our meeting.—MRS. F. SHOUP.

ILLINOIS.

Mulkeytown, Nov. 22.—I closed my meeting at this place the 19th, with 19 additions. Meeting at Six Mile in progress with a Bro. Peck at the helm; 13 additions to date.—HATTRESS H. SLICK.

Watseka, Nov. 20.—At the close of our regular Endeavor meeting last evening a mother made the good confession. Our Sunday-school is in fine condition. We have a number of consecrated business men in this department of work and their help is much appreciated by the pastor.—B. S. FERRALL.

Albion, Nov. 21.—J. H. Stotler, of Mt. Carmel, held us an excellent meeting of 22 days, ending Nov. 13 with 48 additions.—JAY C. HALL.

Eilery, Nov. 21.—Our meeting was a grand success. C. W. Freeman, commenced Oct. 13 and closed Nov. 13, with 66 additions; 52 by confession. Our Sunday-school responded grandly. Class A., 9; class B., 3; class C., 13; class E., 9; class F., 7; class G., 1; Bible class, 4.—JAMES T. HUNT.

LeRoy, Nov. 20.—We closed our meeting here yesterday. There were 25 accessions to the church and two reclaimed. Miss Nona McCormick was with us during the last two and a half weeks. She is a first-class leader and solo singer. The preaching was done by the writer.—F. A. SWORD.

Kansas, Nov. 20.—Meeting at South Charleston closed the 17 inst., with 43 additions. Notwithstanding the snow and rain the interest was good throughout. Four additions the last night Congregations desiring meeting in December write me at Kansas.—E. F. KERAN.

Thanksgiving.

A tear or two, a prayer or two,
For the dead that have gone before us;
Pure thoughts that stray from the world away
To the sweet heaven bending o'er us.

Strong hopes that thrill with a noble will,
For the work that may choose and call us;
Deep soul-content, that but good is meant,
In whatever may befall us.

A song, a smile, and a pulse the while
That throbs with the joy of living;
A kiss or so from dear lips, and lo!
This is the heart's thanksgiving.

The Lost Emigrants.

BY R. H. JCHNSON.

CHAPTER I.

"On the 14th of August, 18—, the sailing ship, Good Luck, Captain Wolcott, left this port for Western South America and California, via Cape Horn, with about sixty passengers and a cargo of assorted merchandise. The vessel was last spoken by the English brig, White Wing, off the Falkland Islands. Since then no tidings have come of the missing ship, though many months have elapsed, and fears have deepened into the conviction that she went down with all on board in trying to weather the stormy Cape, having either gone ashore in a foggy and tempestuous sea or collided with an iceberg."

The foregoing extract from the Saturday Evening Post, of Philadelphia, of Sept. 6, 18—, of the year following the vessel's departure, was brought to my attention some years later by a friend of some of the emigrants, upon my recent return to Pennsylvania. And as I am possibly able, even at this late date, to give some comfort to surviving friends, and to tell a tale which may prove instructive and helpful to others, I yield to the call of duty in setting forth the story of the lost emigrants.

Instantly, I hear a chorus of voices: "Who are you, and what are your qualifications for solving this mystery of the seas?" Reversing the order of the questions, I answer: Although I cannot say of these incidents as did the founder of the Roman race in his narration: "Of which I formed a great part," since my part was small, yet I assert that my opportunities to know were good, as I was among the passengers of the ill-fated ship, and therefore I have a right to speak.

As to the other question, Who am I? I answer: I was then known as Dorothea Winston. My father, Erasmus Winston, was a Lutheran minister in charge of a church in the village of Calderon in Eastern Pennsylvania. I was sent to Chester, to a seminary for instruction, and completed the course of study in my sixteenth year. I returned home only to have my hopes and aspirations cut short by the serious illness and sudden death of my beloved mother.

My father, whose health was none too good, was prostrated with grief. He was a changed man with the death of his inseparable and dearly loved companion. He lost interest in his work, and with the hope of benefit from a sea voyage, and of renewed health in the "Sunset Land," decided to embark for that distant field with his only child and his personal effects. This news he broke to me one day as we stood by mother's grave, where we had gone with flowers.

Long he stood absorbed in thought; then, suddenly turning to me, said: "Dorothea, thou gift of God, as the name implies, are you willing to leave this grave and your friends behind you and go with me to the far off Pacific Coast?" Putting my hand in his I said: "Yes, father, I love this grave, but I know she is not here; her spirit is in heaven. I think of her as over there. Kind friends, for her sake and ours, will watch over her grave. And if you can find health and comfort in travel and a new home I am ready to say with Ruth: 'Whither thou goest there will I go.'" Accordingly, the matter was decided.

Learning that the ship, Good Luck, was soon to sail for San Francisco with a party of emigrants, my father made arrangements and a few days thereafter we went aboard of her at her Philadelphia wharf.

It was a beautiful evening in autumn when we left the city in tow of a tug and watched the banks of the Delaware, wrapped in a dreamy haze. Next morning, when we came on deck, our tug had vanished and we, under a cloud of canvas, were tossing the foam from our bow as we swiftly sped through Delaware Bay. Already Capes May and Henelopen, standing like sentinels on either hand at the entrance of the bay, were dimly outlined, while directly ahead I looked for the first time upon the heaving bosom of the Atlantic, with which I was to become so familiar.

I looked around on the throng of two or three score souls. Their faces, like the Atlantic's, were strange, and I wondered how I should like the acquaintance that must necessarily ripen in the months we must be shut in together in our miniature world.

A gentleman and lady particularly arrested my attention. They were of mature years, with threads of silver in their hair and with countenances expressive of that benevolence and sympathy that glorifies even the homeliest visage, and which in their case added a higher charm to comely faces. Seeing my eyes fixed upon them, they approached my father and me and spoke of necessary companionship in the voyage and, introducing themselves as Simon and Rebecca Gray, expressed the hope that we might be mutually helpful during the journey. Their simple speech and plain but neat attire at once revealed them to me as Friends, and friends indeed I subsequently found them.

Presently the wind freshened, the waves became more boisterous, and I discovered that the capes were gliding behind us and we were upon the open sea. The whitecaps were gleaming on either hand and the wind, laden with seadamp, was momentarily becoming stiffer. It soon became necessary for my invalid father to go below. Accordingly, we arose and started for the companionway; but the ship was reeling and staggering so that we made a very uncertain way, and soon found ourselves charging headlong upon the mainmast; when suddenly a young man, who proved to be the ship's surgeon, came running apparently from vacancy and touching his cap said: "Pray allow me;" and taking us each by an arm, steadied us in our descent to the cabin. Then, lifting his cap, he said: "Rather a rough introduction to old Neptune, but you will find, I hope, that he improves upon acquaintance." And before we could thank him he had vanished as he came.

Thanksgiving.

Thanksgiving! Thanksgiving! November is here,
The beautiful crown of the wonderful year!
Like doves to the windows from east and from west,
The children come back to the cosy old nest.

Thanksgiving! Thanksgiving! the old folks at home
Are so glad by the fireside to see them all come;
Though the forties and fifties are silvering their hair,
They are boys yet and girls to the good people there.

Thanksgiving! Thanksgiving! sit down by the fire,
Talk over old times with the happy old sire;
Tell mother, whose hair is like the new-fallen snow,
That you love her no less than in days long ago.

Oh, the home, the old home! The new may be sweet,
But not like the old to the world-weary feet;
Be it long ere the hearthlight shall fade from its walls,
And the cheerful old lovelight go out in its halls.

Moved to Thanksgiving Street.

An old gentleman got up once in a meeting and said he had lived nearly all of his life on Grumble Street, but not long ago he had moved over on Thanksgiving Street. His face showed it. Paul and Silas in jail at Philippi, when they had received stripes on their backs and had their feet in the stocks, still sang praises to God. If some of us were in jail, with our feet in the stocks, I don't think we would sing much. We want a cheerful Christianity.—D. L. Moody's Anecdotes.

Thanksgiving.

Hushed as the silence that follows praise
Is the mystic peace of the autumn haze,
That, soft and mellow, and touched with gold,
Wraps hill and vale in its lustrous fold,
Here and there by the sunshine kissed
To violet, amber and amethyst;
Or blown by the breath of the breeze away
From the meadows shorn and the woodlands gray.

We've heard the last of the wild bird's call,
We've watched the loose leaves flutter and fall;
There are empty nests on the naked bough,
There's a dream of snow on the mountain's brow;
The summer's work is over and done,
And the brown fields sleep in the waning sun;
Fruit of the harvest is gathered in,
And grain is heaped both in barn and bin.

And up from the homes that are richly blest,
Dowered with abundance and crowned with rest,
And up from the hearts that in highest mood
The lowliest bow in their gratitude,
Anthems arise to the Giver of all,
Whose love beholds if a sparrow fall,
Whose matchless grace on the earth hath smiled,
Like a parent's look on a cradled child.

From near and far as the household bands
Cluster and clasp in the best of lands,
That aye in the wash of the silver sea
Hears the lofty music of liberty,
That still where its mighty rivers flow
Sees peace, and learning, and progress grow—
From near and far to the God above
And lifted the strains of a nation's love.

And even from those who must sit apart
In the glimmering twilight of the heart,
Whose hopes have faded, whose dear ones lie
With pale hands crossed 'neath the autumn sky,
Because there is healing after strife,
And a conquering faith in the better life—
From the sad and the worn, as the last leaves fall,
There ascends a psalm to the Lord of all.

"Neglecting to be Thankful."

CAL OGBURN.

(Illustrated Sermon.)

"See that ye walk circumspectfully . . . giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. 5:15, 20).

"In every thing give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you" (1 Thess. 5:18).

Diagonally across the street from where I once lived there was a man who was very sick with an incurable affliction of the stomach. He was slowly starving to death, and that, too, with a ravenous appetite. It was truly pitiful to see him as he grew weaker day by day, and to hear him begging for food, but unable to retain a single morsel when it was given him.

He often said, "I am as hungry as I ever was when working in the harvest field, but my stomach refuses nourishment of every kind. It absolutely rebels against the daintiest and most inviting dishes that culinary skill can prepare."

He had lived intemperately and ungratefully, as many are now doing. Frequently he reviewed his life and recounted his selfishness, and as the tears of regret came into his eyes would say, "If God will only spare my life I will never take a drink of water or a morsel of food without first thanking him for it," but alas, the days of his years were soon told!

APPLICATION.

Thoughtlessness is a common sin. We all have blessings from God that we do not pause to consider. Sometime, when it is too late, we may reflect regretfully upon our manners of life and vainly wish that we could recall the past that we might thank God each day for his daily bounty and our ability to enjoy the same. Let us all acknowledge the mercies and blessings of our Father now, and ascribe to him gratitude and praise. To-morrow will be too late. "Be ye thankful."

New Market, Ia., Nov. 20.

The Admiral's Thahksgiving.

The great pageant was ended; the beautiful arch stood unnoted amid the rush of traffic; the fleet which had covered the broad waters of the bay was scattred and dissolved. From the east front of the capitol one looked out upon the beautiful lawn and saw nothing of the shouting thousands, the troopers or the artillery. The priceless sword had been deposited for safekeeping in some burglar-proof vault; the vase of solid silver which four men could scarcely lift was taken away wrapped in its soft enfoldings, and the loving cup of pure gold was shut tight in its casket of satin-lined morocco. The great festivities were things of the past, and the noblest triumph accorded to any modern victor had died out in the "light of common day."

But the one American citizen who had for so many days constituted the center of these innumerable hosts had one chosen wish still to fill; and the worshipers in a modest urban chapel saw him bowed upon his knees while the rector at the desk read "by request" the words of devout thanksgiving: "Most gracious Lord, whose mercy is over all thy works, we praise thy holy name that thou hast been pleased to conduct in safety, through the perils of the great deep, this thy servant, who now desireth to return thanks unto thy holy church. May he be duly sensible of thy merciful providence toward him, and ever express his thankfulness by a holy trust in thee, and obedience to thy laws, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen." It is the best and most fitting close to a splendid and most memorable incident.—The Interior.

The Way to Live.

A friend who visited some relatives in the country was asked about them. "They have, I suppose, their winter apples stored away?" "Yes, plenty of them, and they are fine." "And they have plenty of potatoes and cabbage, celery, squash, pumpkins and onions, stored away, and cider and apple-butter and preserves?" "Yes, abundance of everything, and they have plenty of firewood, and hay and feed for their cows and horses and sheep. And they have five or six shoats just fat enough, and they hung away a bunch of sage for the sausage—milk, of course, and butter and cream and chickens and turkeys." After a moment of thoughtful reflection: "I say Charley, that is the way for a family to live." "I say so too," answered Charley, with a tone of deep feeling in his voice.—The Interior.

Thanksgiving Proclamation.

A national custom dear to the hearts of the people calls for the setting apart of one day in each year as an occasion of special thanksgiving to Almighty God for the blessings of the preceding year. This honored observance acquires with time a tenderer significance. It enriches domestic life. It summons under the family roof the absent children to glad reunion with those they love.

Seldom has this nation had greater cause for profound thanksgiving. No great pestilence has invaded our shores.

Liberal employment waits upon labor.

Abundant crops have rewarded the efforts of the husbandman and new increased comforts have come to the home.

The national finances have been strengthened and public credit has been sustained and made firmer.

In all branches of industry and trade there has been an unequaled degree of prosperity, while there has been a steady gain in the moral and educational growth of our national character.

Churches and schools have flourished.

American patriotism has been exalted.

Those engaged in maintaining the honor of the flag with such signal success have been in a large degree spared from disaster and disease.

An honorable peace has been ratified with a foreign nation with which we were at war, and we are now on frienoly relations with every power on earth.

The trust which we have assumed for the benefit of the people of Cuba has been faithfully advanced. There is marked progress toward the restoration of healthy industrial conditions and under wise sanitary regulations the island has enjoyed unusual exemption from the scourge of fever.

The hurricane which swept over our new possession of Porto Rico, destroying the homes and property of the inhabitants, called forth the instant sympathy of the United States, who were swift to respond with generous aid to the sufferers.

While the insurrection still continues in the Island of Luzon, business is resuming its activity, and confidence in the good purposes to the United States is rapidly being established throughout the archipelago.

For these reasons and countless others, I, William McKinley, President of the United States, do hereby name Thursday, the thirtieth day of November next, as a day of general thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed as such by all our people on this continent and in our newly acquired islands, as well as by those who may be at sea or sojourning in foreign lands, in the churches or meeting-places of all denominations, in order that in the social features of the day its real significance may not be lost sight of, but fervent prayers may be offered to the Most High for a continuance of the divine guidance, without which man's efforts are in vain, and for divine consolation to those whose kindred and friends have sacrificed their lives for our country.

I recommend also that on this day, so far as may be found practicable, labor shall cease from its accustomed toil, and charity abound toward the sick, the needy and the poor.

In witness whereof I have set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

Thanksgiving—Acrostic.

The fields of grain are garnered now,
High-heaped are stack and bin and mow,
A wealth of fruit the cellars hide,
Nor is there lack of grain beside.
Kindred and friends who gather here
Shall swell the strain of mirthful cheer.
Great God, to Thee our songs of praise
In humble gratitude we raise.

In peace our land triumphant grows;

Thanksgiving for Common Mercies.

They should prompt us to thanksgiving just because they are common. Food, nourishing and diversified; raiment, comfortable and appropriate, even if not always in the latest fashion; shelter, safe and comfortable; all the material necessaries of life, not to mention its luxuries; pleasant companionships, tried and trusty friendships, opportunities for study, culture and recreation; business usefulness and success; spiritual advantages of many kinds—these, or most of them, are common to the large majority of men and women, young or old, especially in this land of ours. Is not this fact something for which to thank God?

When we receive great mercies, special tokens of the divine goodness, gratitude is spontaneous, impulsive, outspoken. It is natural. The absence of it causes comment. Yet, such favors, although they may suggest the divine care and love more striking than our ordinary blessings, are no more real, are hardly more conspicuous, proofs thereof. As we look back over childhood and youth, it is not the memory of this or that occasional and special gift or other proofs of regard which swells afresh within our hearts the tide of reverence and love for our parents. It is the recollection of their unvarying affection, their unfaltering care, their scrupulousness in ordering the little, common matters of every-day life for our highest benefit. So it ought to be when we study the dealing of our Heavenly Father with us. While we thank him heartily for the exceptional favors which he has bestowed, let the ordinary blessing, which have come to seem so much matters of course, yet which are so vital to our welfare, be acknowledged with gratitude no less earnest and frank.

To appreciate them at their true value, reflect what our lives would become without them. Consider the difference between ourselves and others who do not possess them in the same degree, if at all. No unusually vivid imagination is required, nor any prolonged or severe mental effort. It is God's common mercies to us, after all, which constitute what we might call the atmosphere of our lives. Their presence increases our happiness indescribably. Let God be thanked for them, therefore, more devoutly than ever.—Congregationalist.

Washing Flannels.

The following method has been used with unvarying success for years. Use water that is as hot as you can bear your hands in; dissolve a little Gold Dust Washing Powder in the water and add enough soap to make a strong suds. Wash the flannels through two suds prepared in this way, plunging them up and down, and rubbing gently between the hands to get clean. Soap should never be applied directly to the flannel. Rinse through clear water of the same temperature as used for the washing; place them smoothly on a line in the sunshine and air.

For a Perfect Thanksgiving.

For a perfect thanksgiving we need new minds. The ones we have often prove forgetful of God and unmindful of his blessings and mercies. They are entirely too much occupied with pleasure and gain getting. The minds we should have will be clear enough to see in every good and perfect thing a gift from God, but they will be wise enough to value the Giver far more highly than gifts. Their chief pleasure will consist in dwelling on him.

For a perfect thanksgiving we need new hearts—hearts that really respond to God's love. The generous expression of love can only be interpreted by sympathetic hearts. A gift received by a child who understands his father's love and whose heart responds to it is valued by the receiver, not only for its intrinsic worth, but far more as an expression of affection. Likewise to the Christian every material and spiritual gift is appreciated fully for its own worth, but much more as a gift of love from God. How cold our hearts are! Let us ask God to quicken them till they glow with love for them.

For a perfect thanksgiving we need new voices. Religiously we are not expressive enough. The psalmist said: "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so." We who live by his generous bounty are strangely stingy of praise. We ought to praise him continually in our hearts; but very often our hearts should overflow with praise. We owe it to him, to our fellows and to ourselves to speak of his blessings. Let this thanksgiving mark a beginning in our lives of praises to God.

For a perfect thanksgiving we need new hands; our old ones are too selfish. They hoard up the harvests. They hide the gold. They gather in the good. The new hands we need are unselfish. They distribute what is gathered; they minister and bless. As we think of God's bounties, and bless him in our hearts for them, let us show our gratitude in a substantial way, as well as by praising him with our lips. We may begin this Thanksgiving day to train our hand to deeds of generosity for him.—The Cumberland Presbyterian.

Pardoned out of Office.

Among the stories of that former governor of Texas, familiarly known as "Sam" Houston, is more than one amusing tale. There was a financial agent of the penitentiary who had warmly opposed the election of Governor Houston, but was particularly anxious to retain his own pleasantly lucrative position. Consequently the governor was soon in receipt of a petition in which the man's years of faithful service and special qualificatious for the place were set forth in glowing terms by himself. The governor sent for him and said, gravely:

"It appears from this petition that you have been in the penitentiary eight years?"

"I have," was the reply.

"And during that time you have performed faithfully every duty that has come in your way, to the best of your ability?"

"I have," answered the agent, his courage swiftly rising.

"Then, sir," said the governor, with the air of one conferring a priceless favor, "I pardon you out."—Youth's Companion.

Thanksgiving.

Lord, for the erring thought
Not into evil wrought;
Lord, for the wicked will
Betrayed and baffled still;
For the heart from itself kept,
Our thanksgiving accept.

For ignorant hopes that were Broken to our blind prayer;
For pain, death, sorrow sent Unto our chastisement;
For all loss of seeming good,
Quicken our gratitude.

What it Means to be a Religious Teacher.

Not long since I was called to deliver an address in a country town not far from this city. The committee had directed me to a certain hotel. When I reached the place I was met by a courteous gentleman of about sixty summers, whose face betokened intelligence, kindness and sincerity. Having taken a seat in the parlor my eyes rested for a moment upon a heap of papers on a table. The top paper of the heap proved to be the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, of St. Louis, Mo. This excited my curiosity a little and I ventured to say, "Well, you are a reader of the C.-E., I see." "Yes," came the response, "I have never taken any religious paper except the EVANGELIST. I began when it was first started and I have read every issue, so far as I know." After this reply I felt free to ask other questions, and in this conversation I heard the following words which have fastened themselves upon my memory: "My brother, I well remember when Ben Franklin's paper circulated throughout this region. When the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST started some us began to read it. It was not long till there was a great deal of exchanging of papers among the brethren. We noticed that two of our own papers were standing for different policies, especially on the subject of missions, and on our attitude toward other religious bodies. I will never forget," continued my host, "the remark of Elder Martindale, which he made in a sermon. I was a boy just beginning to take an interest in these matters. Elder Martindale said, 'Brethren, in twenty years from this day there will be but one paper circulating in this region among our people. Brother Franklin's paper is on the wrong side. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST stands for the right policy and will prove a mighty power for good.' This remark created a great stir in the community, and do you know sir," and my host waxed warm, "I could attend a prayer-meeting in that day, listen attentively to all the prayers, then be able to tell nine times out of every ten the paper the people were taking?" "What," said I, "do you mean you could tell from their prayers?" "Exactly so, sir. Those who were reading the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST were looking forward full of hope and expectation. They seemed to want to know more and more. Those who were reading the other paper were looking backward, as if truth was in the past, and we had found it and fixed it. Now, sir, I have lived to see the prophecy of Elder Martindale literally fulfilled. The other paper is gone. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST still remains, and while I never met the editor in person, I feel that I know him, and I pray God to spare him to us for many years to come."

This brother's remaks made a deep impression on my heart and I felt at the time that I should write them down and send them to the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Give us editors and preachers who are without "vision" and we will soon have a people whose glory will be a reminiscence. God is in the present tense. The Bible is God speaking here and now. I left that little town with a new and enlarged conception of what it means to be a religious teacher. The last lines of these words of Tennyson came to my mind:

"For tho' the Giant Ages heave the hill,
And break the shore, and evermore
Make and break and work their will;
Tho' world on world in myriad myriads roll
Round us, each with different powers
And other forms of life than ours,
What know we greater than the soul?
On God and godlike men we build our trust!"

Urine, cloudy, milk-like or stringy; dark in color or offensive.

Panful, scalding sensation in passing it.

Dull, heavy headaches, dizzy, tired feeling, faint spells, irregular heart.

Obliged to go often during the day, and to get up many times at night.

Pain or dull ache in the back.

Feeling of oppression and apprehension.

Restless, irritable and hard to please.

All fagged out, run down, sleepless nights and discouraged.

If you have any of these symptoms take the advice of one who has made a life-study of just such diseases and look well to yourself, because you have kidney trouble.

If your urine when allowed to remain undisturbed in a glass or bottle for twenty-four hours, forms a sediment or settling or has a cloudy appearance, it is evidence that your kidneys need immediate attention.

Bright's disease, which is destroying more human lives than any other disease, may be stealing upon you.

The symptoms you have noticed are the danger signals nature sets to show that the track of health is not clear.

Take Swamp-Root, the famous new discovery, whose fame is being heralded by grateful men and women, saved from untimely graves by its immediate and marvelous power over diseases of the kidneys and bladder.

Especially in cases of Bright's disease is Swamp-Root winning new friends every hour.

Swamp-Root succeeds because it cures.

Every man and woman, no matter how healthy and vigorous, would profit by taking Swamp-Root every now and then as a preventive, and thus absolutely forestall kidney and bladder troubles.

Swamp-Root is the triumphant discovery of the eminent kidney specialist, Dr. Kilmer, and is used in the leading hospitals; recommended by skillful physicians in their private practice; and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that medical science has ever been able to compound.

If you have the slightest symptom of kidney or bladder trouble, or if there is a trace of it in your family history, send at once to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., who will gladly send you free by mail immediately, without cost to you, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book of wonderful Swamp-Root testimonials. Be sure to say that you read this generous offer in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Swamp-Root is for sale the world over at druggists in bottles of two sizes and two prices—fifty cents and one dollar. Remember the name, Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghampton, N. Y.

Luther's Idea of a Minister.

Ten qualifications were claimed by Luther for an efficient minister of the gospel:

1. He should be able to teach plainly and in order.
2. He should have a good head.
3. Good power of language.
4. A good voice.
5. A good memory.
6. He should know when to stop.
7. He should be sure of what he means to say.
8. Be ready to stake body and soul, goods and reputation, on its truth.
9. He should study diligently.
10. Should suffer himself to be vexed and criticised by every one.—The Standard.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS, PLATTSBURG, MO.

The Red Box Clew—IX.

Frank smiled rather doubtfully. "How can I tell whether a book is first-class, until I have read it?"

"The way I said," returned Ronald. "See who wrote it. The author's name is the trademark, just like on baking powders. When you know a plate is Haviland china, you know it's all right. Same way with a book by Dickens, or Thackeray, or Scott, or Jane Porter, or Alcott, or Trowbridge, or any of those fellows. They are all right."

"But I suppose there was a time," remarked Frank, "when all those writers were unkown; so suppose nobody had read them, how would they have become famous."

"It isn't famous books you're after, particularly," said Ronald, "it's book that the best critics have pronounced tip-top. Lots of bad books are famous for awhile. It's for critics to settle the business as to whether or not a work is of the right stuff. Young girls haven't the responsibility of deciding the question. So if I were you, I'd leave 'Hearts Aflame' alone. Let me have it a minute."

With great reluntance Frank handed him the exciting volume. Ronald turned over to the middle and read aloud with great gusto: " 'Dear heart, as surely as the bloodred sun arises every morning in the Orient, so surely will my love for thee burst through the tyranny of thy chains and bathe thy feet in crimson waves of my palpitating heart.' So Lorenzo spoke. Rosabella drooped her lily face and a spasm convulsed her bosom, as the thought of Sir Hugh stabbed at her heart." Ronald returned the book with a face of disgust, at which Frank could not forbear laughing. "Who was Sir Hugh?" he inquired.

"Oh, that was her husband," said Frank.

"Then I think it high time that a thought of him was stabbing her! I suppose the tyranny-and-chains business merely means that she was married to somebody else?"

"Oh, yes," cried the girl eagerly, "but you don't know about that, and how cold he was. And Rosabella never did love Sir Hugh."

"Then what made her marry him?" demanded Ronald.

"Oh—I don't know. But she couldn't help it. She was pursued by a Fate. Oh, yes, and she had an aged mother, and she did it for the mother's sake. Anyway, it was noble. Because she had loved Lorenzo from childhood."

"So you are bent on reading it," said Ronald, "although the characters call each other 'thee,' as if they were sonnets?"

"I do so want to see how it ends," said Frank. Ronald said no more, and he presently left the room. Frank dived into the midst of her story. It was so poetic, so sonorous, so wildly exciting. There was no telling what would happen next; the wives and the husbands got hopelessly mixed up, so it was hard to remember who belonged to whom. But it was easy to keep an eye on Lorenzo, because he was a desperate lover, and fought duels, and at last slew that hateful Sir Hugh, who was cold to the last. Mrs. Dew had gone to bed, and all the household was at rest; still Frank sat by the attic lamp, clutching "Hearts Aflame" as if she were afraid it would try to get away from her. Would Rosabella marry Lorenzo? Oh, would she marry him? She read on and on with flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes, and there was only one important interest to Frank in the whole world; not how she could become reconciled to poor Vega; not how she intended to save and save till she had enough mony to buy a home for brother Wilton; not of any future duty of her own. All she wanted to know, all she wanted to think about was this, would Rosabella marry Lorenzo! At last she reached the the end of the book, for it was a short novel. And O, she did not marry him! No, she died, instead! Frank laid down the book, the last page of which she had sprinkled with bitter tears, and burying her head in her arms, she wept for Rosabella—she wept for Lorenzo. She had not grieved over Sir Hugh, although his only fault was that he was in the way and that he was cold. She had been glad when the rapier thrust him through. And to think, after he had been thus put effectually out of the story, that Rosabella had to gradually pine away—nobody knew what she had—nobody thought of giving her medicine—and she had to died, die unmarried to Lorenzo! And Frank wept on. But all pleasures have their end, even tears. So at last she rose and undressed with feverish hands. She was about to get into bed when she remembered that she had not read in the Bible.

She looked at the Scriptures with a hesitating and, it must be confessed, a bored gaze. It was so late—she could "make up" to-morrow—and besides, the Bible didn't look interesting, just then. She knelt down to pray, and whispered, "Dear Father," and her heart cried out, "Oh, why did Rosabella have to die?" So she rose from her knees because she felt that her heart was not in a proper mood for devotion. She had strange, blinding dreams—they came in flashes of light. And they were not about her mother, and there were no angels in them, not one. But there were five or six Lorenzos; and Sir Hugh, who appeared again and again, but always cold; and Rosabella, who was pining away and nobody could stop her. And so Frank didn't want to get up in the morning, and when she did appear her eyes were red and her face pale. She didn't seem to feel like smiling, and she hardly looked at Mrs. Dew. She wandered out in the yard and encountered Vega, who "made a face" at her. Frank didn't care a bit. She considered the deaf girl an unpleasant nuisance, and she said to herself, "Just let her get over her spell the best way she can! I'm tired of her!" She strolled with lagging feet to the summer-house, not even looking at the brook. How could she have been so silly as to take pleasure in wading when there were such creatures as Lorenzo and Rosabella pining away and fighting duels and giving their lives for each other? And how they had talked!—so grand and rolling, and unlike anybody she had ever heard. Wading, indeed!

She found Ronald in the summer-house. But when he saw her coming he left the place and strolled across the pasture and perched on a fence. He was displeased with her, but she didn't care. Then Mrs. Dew called her to come and help in the work, and that made Frank cross. She had a headache, too. But, of course, nobody cared what became of her. There were no Lorenzos to call her "Thee," and die for her! She tried to imagine Rosabella sewing for her living, or waiting upon an irritable little girl, but she couldn't. Rosabella wouldn't have done it. In the meantime Mrs. Dew covertly watched the discontented face and said nothing. At last, however, she broke the silence. "What are you thinking of, my dear?"

"That book," said Frank, briefly. She did not even wish to talk, for that kept her from being as miserable as she desired to be.

"Was it a good book?"

"Oh, yes! Oh, Mrs. Dew, I wonder if there are not others like it in that trunk?"

"Did it make you happy, Frank?"

"No, not happy."

"My dear, was it a book for Christ?"

Frank looked at the housekeeper doubtfully. "It wasn't a religious book," she said, "if that is what you mean, Mrs. Dew. It wasn't a sermon."

"I imagine not. But a book for Christ doesn't have to be a sermon, or 'religious either, in the way your tone implies. Did you feel, while reading it, that you would try to be better? And did it increase your regard for your Bible? Did it make the duties of life appear sweet and wholesome or mean and hateful?"

Frank moved restlessly, then smiled in her old way. "Hateful!" she said, with emphasis.

"Then, my dear, that book was not for Christ, for our duties are the rungs of the ladder that stretches from earth to heaven. A good book and a good friend show us the angels ascending and descending with songs of encouragement, and with helping arms. But a bad book and a bad friend blind our eyes to the angels, and show us only the pleasures of the world; and the every duty seems to lead away from happiness. You know he said the one not for him is against him; so with a book, if it is not for Christ it is against him."

"But what of histories, and school-books and arithmetic, and Latin?" returned Frank.

"They are for the mind's training," returned Mrs. Dew, gently. "You are a child of God. Everything that develops you and makes you true and womanly, and bright and learned, is that not pleasing to your Father? Will he not be glad to have his daughter accomplished? But ever since I read you 'Hearts Aflame' I have been so lonesome; can you guess why? I have not seen your smiles, and they have been good company for me. They have helped me bear my burdens so lightly."

"My smiles!" cried Frank in surprise. "I never think of them."

"Smiles that their owner set no value on are worth the most," said Mrs. Dew. Then Frank gave her one of her sweetest smiles for nothing.

THE SABBATH IN JUDAH.*

The part of Nehemiah's memoirs which is contained in 13:4-31 narrates the events following his visit to Persia and his return to the province of Judah. He seems to have continued several years after his first arrival in Judah in the capacity of governor, and secured the building of the walls and other signs of revival in Jerusalem, but perhaps his leave of absence expired and he was compelled to return to the court at Susa. This was apparently after some twelve years, which seems to be a long period of absence for a courtier; but at all events Nehemiah returned once more to the province and discovered that in his absence several abuses had grown up, and set himself to their repression with vigor.

These abuses were various. First, there was the courtesy shown to foreign peoples, which had reached the extent of offering to Tobiah, the Ammonite leader, a room in the temple courts which had been formally set apart for the use of the Levites, but because of the close relationship sustained by Tobiah to Eliashib the priest through marriage, the foreigner had been permitted to take up his lodgings in the very precincts of the house of God, contrary to all the customs of the past. This Nehemiah discovered on his return, and filled with indignation took instant measures to dispossess Tobiah of his lodgings. His household stuff was thrown out and the place thoroughly cleansed and restored to its former use. The constant efforts made to secure Nehemiah's consent to friendly relations with Tobiah on this and other occasions shows how little scruple was felt by the Jews generally against dealings with foreign people.

A second abuse which he discovered was the fact that the regular tithes prescribed for the Levites had been paid so scantily that this class of temple servants was unable to subsist upon the offerings and had been compelled to resort to their farms or small holdings outside of the city to subsist upon agriculture. One of the chief glories of the latter regime in Judah was the temple service with its large contingent of ministering priests and Levites; and any practice which interfered with the discharge of these sacred functions would be regarded with indignation by a man of Nehemiah's character. He therefore called the rulers or deputies severely to account for their laxity in permitting the decline of offerings on the part of the people, and took instant measures to restore the Levites to the city and to their usual functions, setting officers over the collection of the tithe and its distribution.

A third evil of the situation was the mixed marriages between the Jews and the women of neighboring tribes like the Philistines, the Ammonites and the Moabites. These people resided not alone in the neighboring towns, but in Jerusalem itself, and Nehemiah saw that only vigorous measures could discourage the practice. The measures which he took were certainly sufficiently vigorous to avail (13:25). He was of a character to act on the instant and not to temporize in matters of this kind. Perhaps he felt that there was not time to resort to that instruction which was first of all necessary to ground people in a conception of the true proprieties and to give them an understanding of what was best for the community. But Nehemiah pointed them to the sin of Solomon and its consequences in Israel. He was practically alone in this reform, for not only were the people inclined to these mixed marriages, but the custom had even invaded the priestly ranks, where a grandson of Eliashib, the high priest, had married a daughter of Sanballat, the Horonite, one of the persistent enemies of Nehemiah's reigme and a leader of the combination against him in which Tobiah and other chiefs figured. This son-in-law of Eliashib Nehemiah expelled from his office and established the priests and the Levites in their proper offices and function.

But the greatest of these reforms was that concerning the Sabbath. The practice of observing the Sabbath day had been greatly quickened by the experience of the Jews in exile. While it is true that the Sabbath custom prevailed in the pre-Exilic days, it had no very strong hold upon the people, because the services in the sanctuary in some measure took the place in the popular mind of all individual worship and relieved them of responsibility. But when in the period of the Exile the temple was demolished and its representative worship was made impossible, the practice of observing the Sabbath took a stronger hold upon the Jews of the east, and together with fasting, prayer and other religious services began to be recognized as an essential part of the religious life. But this was apparently not the case in Judah among the people who were left after the destruction of Jerusalem. Little emphasis was placed upon Sabbath observance and the result was that the Sabbath day was made joint partner with the week in all secular concerns. When Nehemiah returned from Babylon the contrast between the practices among the more scrupulous Jews there and those of his brethren in Judah at once impressed him in this particular, and he took instant measures for rectifying the error. He observed that the people were carrying on their regular work, harvesting and wine-making on the Sabbath day, and that they brought their market produce, consisting of wine, grapes, figs and other commodities into the markets of Jerusalem and apparently made no distinction between that day and the others. This custom was naturally followed by foreigners who found Jerusalem a profitable place for the sale of their wares. The dealers in dried fish who came from Tyre are especially mentioned. This made the market streets of Jerusalem a scene of noise and confusion on the Sabbath.

Nehemiah took the city officials to task for this conduct and urged them to abolish the practice of desecrating the Sabbath in this manner. Not content with advice he ordered the gates of the city closed on Friday night at sundown, so that no merchants could enter until after the Sabbath, and he placed his own servants on guard at the gates to enforce this order. It was difficult to change so radically the customs of a people in a short time. The merchants and marketmen still persisted in coming to the gates, thinking that the strictness of the rule would soon wear away, or unable to understand the meaning of the prohibition. This still further angered the governor, who warned them in the most forcible language that he would place them under arrest if they further molested the quiet of the city on the Sabbath. Perhaps they thought by lodging outside and displaying their wares beyond the gates of the city the people would be tempted to come out and make their purchases as usual. In this at least they were disappointed by the vigilance of Nehemiah. Further steps were taken to make regular and orderly the observance of the Sabbath, and the governor put upon the Levites the responsibility of enforcing the rules regarding the closing of the gates and other regulations for keeping the day sacred. For this and other works of his in behalf of the true religion Nehemiah calls upon God to remember him and to reward him for all that he has done in Judah.

The Sabbath which Nehemiah sought to establish in Judah as it was observed in Persia by the Jews was, of course, very different from the Lord's day which we keep as a day of worship and of sacred activity. That Sabbath depended upon the command in the Decalogue to keep the seventh day holy, and looked backward to the Sabbatic rest of God at the creation, or as the Deuteronomic record of the Decalogue reads, it had its motive in the remembrance of slavery in Egypt and the need of a day of rest (Deut. 5:12-15). The Christian day of worship rests upon the sanctions of the resurrection of our Lord and upon the apostolic practice which soon recognized in it a time specially sacred to the Christian community as bearing within itself so many memorials of Jesus Not only the resurrection, but Pentecost, came upon the first day of the week, and the two manifestations of Jesus to his disciples were upon that day. Thus early in the history of the church the Lord's day, side by side with the Sabbath in Jewish-Christian circles, came to be regarded as a sacred day; and presently the observance of the Sabbath fell away, while, of course, in Gentile communities it had never been kept. There was no transfer from the Sabbath to the Lord's day, as the two days rested upon different foundations and were characterized by different activities. The one was a national institution, the other universal. The one was a day of legal enactment, the other of grateful memory. But certainly the effort to preserve the Lord's day from desecration is as laudable and as necessary as was that of the ancient Jew to keep his Sabbath free from secularizing influences. There is no more sacred heritage of a people than that of rest upon the first day of the week, and this is the need of all classes in the community. Whatever ministers to the upbuilding of the Christian nature and the broadening of one's views of God may be regarded as a means of grace and as legitimate upon the Lord's day. Whatever tends to diminish the sacredness of the day and to degrade it to the level of mere secularism should be earnestly contended against. Much can be done in this direction by all Christian people, and whatever is possible should not fail of emphatic attempt by all who honor our Lord.

Dangers to the Bible.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT, Director.

It is of interest to note the character of some of the greatest dangers that have menaced the Word of God. First, there was the open hostility of Rome in the first two or three centuries of Christian history. The Old Testament had been carefully preserved by the Jews in the Hebrew language and had also been translated into the Greek tongue to grace the collection which Ptolemy Philadelphus was making in his great library at Alexandria. By these means the older Scriptures had obtained a widespread circulation and were in no danger of suppression. But when the New Testament began to take form in the writing of the Epistles, and later in the formal statements of the Gospels and the Acts, the power of Rome was waiting to exhaust its endeavors for the suppression and destruction of these precious records. Copies were rare and expensive, and soon it became a matter of danger to the owner of such a portion of the Word of God to be known as its possessor. For generations stretching into centuries, this condition prevailed, and it was only the providential oversight of its divine Author that preserved the Book from utter destruction.

During the following centuries a new danger confronted the Scriptures. No longer persecuted and in danger of the fires of Roman inquisitors, they were hid away in the convents and monasteries, which were the only centers of learning during those yaars which are so appropriately named the Dark Ages. They could scarcely be other than dark when the Word of Life was hid under a monastic bushel. The common people had no access to the Scriptures, and indeed the scholars of the times, who alone possessed that privilege, scarcely deemed it a privilege to be able to read The Book, preferring the legends of saints and martyrs instead.

Almost as serious was the situation that was presented in France and Germany after the Reformation had brought the Scriptures into the hands and hearts of the common people. The enemies of the Book set themselves to a deliberate plan of laughing it out of existence. Voltaire and his followers promised themselves that what imperial Rome had failed to accomplish by its persecution and monastic Rome by its suppression, they would succeed in doing by ridicule. It was therefore to sarcasm, invective and wit that they resorted in their campaign against the Bible. They boasted that they would soon cut down every tree in the Christian's paradise. They said that in fifty years there would not be a Bible in all France. We know what the results of that ridicule were. France and Germany were flooded with atheism and immorality. The court of Frederick was a hotbed of scepticism. But Voltaire and his followers had laid a train of powder which it only took Marat to ignite, and the Reign of Terror was the result. Infidelity had borne its fruit, and it was bitter indeed, but when the smoke of battle cleared away it was found that the Bible had a stronger hold than ever upon the people.

Early in the present century a new form of opposition to the Bible appeared in the rationalistic criticism of the Scriptures, which, starting from a presupposition that a divine revelation is impossible, and that there is no such thing as miracle, endeavored to disprove the genuineness and authenticity of the Bible from internal evidence. For a time much alarm was felt among believers, because of this fresh attack, but the movement itself aroused a host of scholarly and reverent defenders, who used the presence of higher criticism to show that the Bible contained abundant evidences of its own veracity. Indeed, higher criticism is only a method, and not a result; and while it was believed by the enemies of the Book that this method would demonstrate its weakness, it has, on the contrary, most conclusively proved its strength, and has shown, not only that the Christian world has nothing to fear from higher criticism, but that the most important advances that have been made by men, themselves higher critics, who were earnest and reverent believers in the divine Book.

It remains, therefore, only to add that the greatest danger that confronts the Bible to-day is that of neglect at the hands of its friends. It is not from organized opposition; it is not from monastic suppression; it is not from ridicule and wit; it is not from rationalistic criticism, that the Bible suffers, but rather from the indifference to its contents that its chief danger arises. In this fact, that all forms of opposition to the Word of God are absolutely insignificant as compared with the lack of interest manifested by those who believe it to be the Word of God, lies the motive of a strong appeal to every Christian, whatever be the special form of his activity in the church, to address himself anew and more earnestly than ever to a study of the great Book, and a mastery of its contents.

BURGESS.

Mrs. Martha Priscilla Burgess, after a lingering illness, gently fell asleep Nov. 3, 1899. Her maiden name was Owens. She was born in Anne Arundel County, Maryland, April 16, 1841. Came to Missouri when she was 14 years old. Received her education in Pleasant Ridge College, in Platte County, Mo. She was united in marriage to Thomas J. Burgess, in Andrew Co., Mo., Dec. 22, 1859. For many years her home has either been in or near St. Joseph. She was baptized by Moses E. Lard in 1861, and ever thereafter was an earnest, active, faithful member of the church. Her husband and four children, one son and three daughters, survive her. Her daughter Miss Mattie, well known as a missionary in India under the direction of the C. W. B. M., was called home about a year ago on account of her mother's failing health. Mrs. Burgess was interested in all church work, but especially in the work of the C. W. B. M., and punctually attended, as long as she was able, all the meetings of the Wyatt Park Church Auxiliary, of which she was a charter member. When no longer able to attend she sent her offering, a passage of Scripture to be read and a loving message. She was by no means an ordinary woman, but one of the noblest and strongest characters I have ever know, and has left her impress for good upon a very large circle of friends and acquaintances. Indeed, hundreds miss and mourn her, and will ever hold her in sacred memory. The funeral was conducted from the family home in St. Joseph, and was largely attended. The sermon was by the writer from the words, "Blessed are they dead which die in the Lord."

M. M. GOODE.

EAGER.

Rebecca Casterline was born April 24, 1828, in St. Clair Co., Ill., and died Nov. 12 1899, near Beverly, Ill. She married Richard Eager Oct. 4, 1845 and was the mother of seven children, four boys and three girls. Her husband and three sons and twelve grandchildren and three great-grandchildren with a host of friends and relatives mourn their loss. She united with the Baptist Church in her youth, but when the Mound Prairie Christian Church was organized she put in her membership with them. She leaves a practical Christian life for the memory and example of her children. She will be greatly missed. Her funeral was held Nov. 13 at Mound Prairie Church, conducted by J. D. DABNEY.

IN THE DAYS OF JEHU, by J. B. Ellis, is a well-written and intensely interesting Bible narrative. The lesson taught is that idolatry is ruin and the worship of God is life and peace. 189 pages. Cloth, 75 cents. Christian Publishing Co.

Winter in the South.

The season approaches when one's thoughts turn toward a place where the inconveniences of a Northern winter may be escaped. No section of this country offers such ideal spots as the Gulf Coast on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad between Mobile and New Orleans. It possesses a mild climate, pure air, even temperature and facilities for hunting and fishing enjoyed by no other section. Accommodations for visitors are first-class, and can be secured at moderate prices. The L. & N. R. R. is the only line by which it can be reached in through cars from Northern cities. Through cars schedules to all points in Florida by this line are also perfect. Write for folders, etc., to GEO. B. HORNER, D. P. A., St. Louis, Mo.

FLORIDA.

A Superior Through Sleeping Car Line
Between St. Louis and Jacksonville.

Commencing November 18th the Florida Air Line, consisting of the L., E & St. L. R'y, St. Louis to Louisville, So. R'y in Kentucky, Louisville to Lexington, Queen and Crescent Route, Lexington to Chattanooga, Southern R'y, Chattanooga to Jesup and Plant System, Jesup to Jacksonville, Fla., will inaugurate for the season the great Through Sleeping Car Route to Florida. Through sleeping cars will leave St. Louis 9:15 p.m. daily, passing Louisville 7:00 a.m., Lexington 10:50 a.m., reaching Chattanooga 5:50 p.m., Atlanta 10:30 p.m. and Jacksonville 8:30 a.m. (second morning). Stop-overs allowed. This route is through large cities and interesting country, and is operated over most superior and well established lines of railway. The schedules are fast and most convenient.

In addition to the above schedule leaving St. Louis at night, train leaving St. Louis 8:08 a.m., will arrive Jacksonville the next night 10:00 p.m., making only one night out from St. Louis to Jacksonville.

This line also affords passengers for Florida trip via Asheville, N. C., the greatest American all-year-around resort.

Correspondence solicited and information promptly furnished. R. A. CAMPBELL, Gen'l Passenger Agent, St. Louis, Mo.

This is also the best line to points in Kentucky Tennessee, Georgia and North and South Carolina.

Wrecked Homes and the Remedy.

S. T. SHORTESS.

There is no disputing the fact that the homes of America are being rapidly destroyed. If we seek the cause we will find it in the influence of the vicious legislation of the last half century—laws striking at the very foundation of the home. Back of these laws was the low moral standard resulting from the teaching of free love and Mormonism. The one producing the free divorce or polygamy by succession laws of most our states, the other the polygamous code of Utah. Having been raised on the Western Reserve in Ohio and remaining there till nearly twenty-one, I do not remember a single case of divorce and remarriage there. Living for the next twelve years in Central Ohio, I remember one man who went to Indiana and got a divorce. Indiana was among the first to try free divorce, with the result that last year, in Marion County, including Indianapolis, there was one divorce for every four marriages. The number of separations without divorce was not reported. In Marion County the divorce business was equal to all the other legal business. As an illustration of the influence of Iowa's free divorce laws, let me give you an instance of which I have some knowledge. A man who had a good wife and a pleasant family took a fancy to a divorced woman and made it almost impossible for his wife to live with him, and when she got a divorce he got married the same day. Our people are asleep and do not realize the extent of the ruin of our homes. A year ago in a respectable portion of one of Iowa's best cities you might have walked our blocks, passing sixteen houses, and in eight of them you would have found fragments of homes destroyed by the influence of our free love, free divorce leprosy. Polygamy by succession is as bad as the polygamy of Utah. Both are legalized adultery. True, many of those who get divorces and marry again think it is all right because the church has suffered such laws to be enacted with scarcely a protest, and has made no real effort to repeal them, and has allowed her ministers to officiate at these mock marriages, and admits the parties to her fellowship. But this does not make it right. Now as to the remedy for this state of affairs. In the interest of morality it is necessary that we make radical changes in our laws in regard to marriage and divorce and in regard to the relation of the sexes to each other and these laws should emanate from Congress, so as to be of uniform application throughout our entire country. This will require amendments to our national constitution. Many are advocating this, but so far as I know nothing very definite has been proposed.

Please permit me through the columns of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST to make some suggestions. In order that the laws in regard to marriage and divorce may not be oppressive to women, it will be necessary to make the sexes equal before the law. So we need, first, an amendment to strike out the word male from the constitution. Second amendment, no person shall be deprived of any personal or property right on account of sex. Third, Congress shall have the sole power to legislate in regard to marriage and divorce and the relation of the sexes to each other and in regard to the custody of the dependent children. Fourth, Congress shall have power to provide for absolute divorce for the cause of fornication and for no other cause, and may permit the innocent party to marry again. Fifth, Congress shall have power to provide for legal separation for any sufficient cause, but shall have no power to permit the parties to marry again nor to prevent their living together again by giving notice of mutual consent. Sixth, no law legalizing crime shall be passed by Congress or state or municipal government.

May God grant the church repentance and forgiveness on freedom from complicity with evil and bring us all to the front in all moral reforms and in all conflicts against unrighteousness and give us the moral principle and the courage and the wisdom and the power to keep Roberts and all other criminals out of office and all legalization of crime out of our statute books and help us to save the nation and the world for Christ's sake!

Vinton, Ia.

[While divorces are increasing and their influence on the home is destructive, we are hardly prepared for the sweeping statements in the above article. We are in favor of uniform marriage laws throughout the states and of the single standard of morals for both men and women and of far more stringent divorce laws, but we do not find these things the only thing destructive to home life in the land. There is the liquor traffic, and then the craze for wealth out from which has come our present industrial and social systems, all of which are opposed to the true home life. But the agitation of the divorce danger is timely, and if we cannot concur in all of the conclusions stated above, we can commend the wisdom of Brother Shortess trying with us to emphasize this danger.—EDITOR.]

SAMPLE PAGES.

We will send sample pages of Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900 to any one requesting them. This Commentary is just the book for use by teachers and superintendents. It treats the Sunday-school lessons for the coming year from all standpoints, and any teacher that will carefully study the contents of this Commentary will come before their class thoroughly prepared to impart the lesson in an acceptable manner. Now is the time to send for sample pages and get an idea of what Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900 contains. THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY FOR 1900.

The Sunday-school lessons for 1900 are well selected and will be of unsual interest. The basis of the lessons is found in Matthew, Mark, Luke and John and they are arranged as nearly chronologically as they can be. Many helps will be provided, all of which have merit, but among them none will be found more useful than The Christian Lesson Commentary, by W. W. Dowling.

I have examined the Commentary for 1900 carefuly and find it full of the best things that can be said on the lessons. I am specially pleased with the "Suggestive" department for "study," for "teaching" and for "review."

The Christian Publishing Company has a large constituency and continually increasing, and the large annual sale of their various publications is in evidence that their work is appreciated. This is as it ought to be.

THE CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST.

A WEEKLY FAMILY AND RELIGIOUS JOURNAL.

Vol. xxxvi December 7, 1899 No. 49

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY

CHRISTIAN - EVANGELIST FOR 1900

It is purposed to make the closing volume of the "Christian-Evangelist," for the Century, a crowning one in its history. Following is a partial announcement of things in store for our readers the coming year:

EDITORIAL.

This department will deal with the leading events in the current history of the world, and will discuss vital religious themes, including a series of editorials on "THE MESSAGE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY TO THE TWENTIETH." The editor will be assisted by W. W. Hopkins and by Prof. W. E. Garrison. The usual editorial features—"Current Events," "Current Religious Thought," "Editor's Easy Chair," "Hour of Prayer" and "Questions and Answers," will be maintained.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

The Sunday-school articles for the coming year will be prepared by our well-known correspondent, W. F. RICHARDSON. These lessons will follow the life of Christ through the entire year. Bro. Richardson will have a national, not to say international Bible Class. Will you join it?

FROM THE CITIES

1. W. Durban, of London, will continue ENGLISH TOPICS, and these, for the next year, are likely to be of unusual interest.

2. S. T. Willis will keep our readers informed of what is going on in the metropolis of the New World, writing of men and movements which come into prominence in Greater New York.

3. E. B. Bagby, our Washington correspondent, will write on such topics as "The Opening Day of Congress," "A White House Reception," "Experiences of a Chaplain in the House of Representatives," "A Day in Mount Vernon," "Washington as a Literary Center," etc.

4. B. B. Tyler, the celebrated Letter Writer, will furnish our readers a weekly letter during 1900, writing from the shadow of Pike's Peak for awhile, and then, perhaps, from the shadow of the University of Chicago, but always with his pen dipped in sunshine.

These are only a few of our leading correspondents. Others will be announced later.

ORIGINAL CONTRIBUTORS.

This department will receive special prominence the coming year, as witness the following:

W. T. MOORE:

1. "Some of Our Pressing Needs."

It is He whose very infancy not only startled a king, and made him fear his throne, but also affrighted the powers of darkness and silenced the heathen oracles; whose childhood puzzled the knowledge of the aged and confounded the doctors of the law; who ruled the course of nature, and made the strong winds obey him, and could walk on the billows of the sea as on a pavement; who fed multitudes by his word, and healed all manner of diseases without medicine; who could break the gates of death, and open the doors of the grave, and call back the spirits of the departed; a Royal Brother, truly!—Henry Scougal.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The center of action and interest in South Africa has shifted for a moment from Natal to the western border of the Orange Free State, where General Methuen is pushing northward to the relief of Kimberley. The battle and British victory which we recorded last week were less decisive than was at first supposed. It is true that the Boers were forced to retreat, but they did so in good order and not without inflicting serious losses upon their enemies. The undiminished vigor of the Free State Boers is evidenced by their second battle with General Methuen's troops at Modder River. The official reports of this engagement are lamentably incomplete, and the commander's prolonged silence in regard to his losses cannot but be regarded as ominous. There seems to be no doubt but that the result was again a British victory and the removal of another obstacle from the road to Kimberley, but General Methuen admits that his losses were serious. In fact, his official dispatch characterizes it as the "bloodiest battle of the century." This is, of course, an exaggeration. There have been at least seven battles in the present century, from Waterloo to Sedan, in which the losses ranged from thirty thousand to twice that number. The casualties at Modder River could not have been as numerous as that if the two armies had annihilated each other to the last man. The most probable estimates place the British loss at about five hundred killed and wounded. General Methuen's force numbers about seven thousand, of whom not less than one thousand have been incapacitated by these two costly victories. But the relief of Kimberley is becoming more and more certain.

The fifty-sixth Congress began its first session on Monday, December 4. For the first time since the close of the fifty-first Congress, the Republican party is in complete control of the executive and legislative departments. Both the Senate and the House are Republican by a good working majority, and the responsibility for the important measures which are to be enacted will rest upon that party. This responsibility is the greater on account of the novel character of some of the problems presented; e. g., questions of administration in our new island possessions, and because the problems with which this Congress has to deal will be the issues in the presidential campaign a year hence. The party caucuses which preceded the opening of Congress decided some important points. The Republican caucus ratified the nomination of Gen. D. B. Henderson, of Iowa, for the speakership and decided, after a spirited debate, to adopt Reed's rules, which prevailed in the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Congress. Mr. Hepburn led the opposition to the Reed rules, as he did in the last Congress, but withdrew his opposition when it became evident that the majority favored the Reed rules. The Democratic caucus named James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, as its nominee for the speakership. In the face of the Republican majority this is an empty honor, so far as the speakership is concerned, but it places him in the line of succession to that office in case of a future shift of the balance of power in the House, and it makes him, for the present, the recognized leader of the minority. Mr. Henderson has announced his intention to allow the minority leader to select the Democratic members of the committees. This will not cost the Speaker any valuable part of his prerogative and will materially aid in preserving the discipline of the House. Speaker Reed took a sort of savage delight in disregarding the recommendations of the Democratic leader, Mr. Bailey, encouraging his rivals and making his position as "leader" as meaningless as possible. Mr. Henderson's method seems to us better adapted to facilitate the work of the House by shutting off petty squabbles.

The first questions which will come before the new Congress are those relating to membership. Of pre-eminent importance is the question of the admission of Mr. Roberts to the House of Representatives. According to Reed's ruling there is no House until every member who presents proper credentials has been sworn in. If this ruling is adhered to, Mr. Roberts will have to be admitted and his later expulsion will require a two-thirds vote, which it will be difficult if not impossible to obtain on account of the partisan aspect of the case, the Democrats standing almost solid for Roberts. On the other hand, when Mr. Roberts presents himself to be sworn in, he may be requested to step aside until the uncontested members have taken the oath. In this case there is a fair probability that he will never be enrolled as a member, and hence will not be expelled by two-thirds vote. The Senate, too, has questions of membership to settle. In four states, California, Utah, Pennsylvania and Delaware, there are vacancies resulting from the failure of the legislatures of these states to elect at their last session. The right of the governor to fill such vacancies by appointment has hitherto been denied, but it is expected that Mr. Quay will make a fight on this point. The following are some of the more important topics which will demand consideration by the present Congress: The establishment of a permanent civil government for Porto Rico and the Philippines; the inauguration of independent government in Cuba; the construction of the Nicaragua Canal and the laying of a Pacific cable, and monetary reform.

Mr. Chamberlain's speech at Leicester last week has been absorbing much of the attention of four countries ever since its delivery. He speaks so frankly of the "understanding amounting practically to an alliance" between England and America, and so heartily welcomes Germany into their triple alliance, and openly censures France for her offensive attitude toward Great Britain in the present struggle, that it has led all of these nations to wonder whether there is some new and secret agreement among the three Tuetonic nations. There is, we believe, no reason to fear that President McKinley has so far exceeded his constitutional prerogative as to make a secret alliance with Great Britain without the sanction of Congress. If such an alliance ever comes, it will not come in that way. But it does not seem necessary to assume any epoch-making, much less any unauthorized act on the part of either the President or Ambassador Choate, in order to account for Mr. Chamberlain's enthusiastic utterances. It is nothing uncommon for Mr. Chamberlain to take the world into his confidence and in spite of his official position to speak with the freedom of a private citizen about the tendencies which he perceives or the things which he would like to see happen. As we interpret his speech of last Thursday night, it means nothing more than that Mr. Chamberlain considers England and America to be eminently friendly nations, attached to each other by all the natural ties of sympathy and interest. We are glad he thinks so; we think so too. And we are heartily glad if he considers that Germany is in a position to enter into the circle on equal terms. It isn't worth while for Englishmen and Americans to get nervous about "entangling alliances" every time they hear an expression of international good will.

The President's message, which comes to hand just as we are closing this paper, is of unusual length and discusses a wide range of subjects of national and international importance. After a fitting reference to the death of vice-President Hobart, the President refers to the prosperous condition of the country and the prevalence of universal good will among the people at home and our friendly relations with every government of the world. The increase of our foreign commerce, the excess of exports over imports, and the healthy condition of the treasury are cited as gratifying evidence of the prosperous condition of the country, together with the increased activity in industry, with a larger employment for labor at higher wages. On the question of finance the President recommends that the Secretary of the Treasury be given additional power and charged with the duty to sell United States bonds and to employ such other effective means as are necessary to support the existing gold standard and to maintain the parity of the coins of the two metals. The President calls the attention of Congress to our merchant marine, which needs to keep pace with our inland growth; to trusts, as involving danger to the common welfare, and as requiring legislation to control or check them. This subject is treated at some length, and quotations are made from the messages of Presidents Harrison and Cleveland. The importance of the Nicaraguan Canal and of the need of early action thereon are also urged. The President also touches upon the happy adjustment of affairs in the Samoan Islands between the United States, Germany and Great Britain, by which the United States comes into the possession of the group of islands known as Tutuila, Ofoo, Olesenga and Manua. This gives us the celebrated Harbor of Pago Pago, the best anchorage in the Pacific. Referring to Cuba, the President says our pledge to that island must be kept and that it must be granted its independence as soon as she is able to enjoy it. Among the numerous other subjects discussed is that of the Philippine Islands. The President recites the history by which these islands came into our possession and the course of events since that to the present time. Concerning the insurrection, the President says it must be put down. Meanwhile, the work of reconstruction is going on. With the speedy suppression of the Tagalo rebellion, life in the archipelago will soon resume its ordinary course under our sovereignty. "Already hundreds of schools are opened and filled with children. Religious freedom is sacredly assured and enjoyed. The courts are dispensing justice. Business is beginning to circulate in its accustomed channels." As to the future government of the Philippines, that rests with the Congress of the United States. It is a grave responsibility, but it is also a great opportunity. "The islands lie under the shelter of our flag. They are ours by every title of law and equity. They cannot be abandoned. If we desert them, we leave them at once to anarchy and finally to barbarism." The President hopes for an early termination of the strife and the prosperity of the islands. The need of legislation for Hawaii, Alaska and Porto Rico is pointed out. In reference to the later, "the time is ripe for the adoption of a temporary form of government." Civil law should succeed military government. The message refers to the celebration in the year 1900, of the establishment of the seat of government in the District of Columbia and to the steps already taken to provide for such celebration. The President closes his message by reminding this Congress of its great opportunities and responsibilities and says, "Never has this nation had more abundant cause than during the past year for thankfulness to God for manifold blessings and mercies, for which we make reverent acknowledgement.

When Brigham H. Roberts presented himself at the bar of the House to be sworn in as a member, he met with a solid protest from both the Republican and Democratic sides of the House, and his case has been referred to a special committee of nine for investigation. It is not probable that Mr. Roberts will be permitted even to take a seat in the House. The American people are not ready to make any such concession to polygamy as the seating of Roberts would imply. The people of Utah will be made to understand at once that if they wish to be represented in the Congress of the United States, they must select men who are not living in violation of the United States law and of the moral sentiments of the whole country.

SOME LINES OF RELIGIOUS PROGRESS.

Whatever divergencies of opinion may exist among us concerning certain unsettled questions we are glad to believe that there is substantial unity among us in relation to those matters that are most vital to our future progress and power as a religious movement. There may be, and no doubt is, a difference in the degree of intensity with which these needs are realized, but there will be, we take it, general acquiescence as to the need of progress along the lines hereinafter indicated.

The most ultra-conservative among us would hardly claim that we have mastered all that the Bible has to teach us. All would consent to the general proposition that it has heights to which we have never yet scaled; that it has depths into which our profoundest researches have not yet penetrated; that it has a length and breadth which have never yet been fully explored by the human intellect; that it contains treasures of spiritual truth yet to be revealed when our religious growth and experiences have brought us into a condition to apprehend and appreciate it. This all follows from the mere fact that the Scriptures are inspired; that is, that they contain a divine content, being an expression of the mind of God in human speech. If the Bible contains a revelation of the character and purposes of God, it would be the height of presumption to suppose that, in the present imperfect condition of our intellectual and spiritual development, we have exhausted its treasures of truth and grace. But since it is God's evident purpose that we attain to the fullest knowledge of His will, it follows that one of the essential lines of progress is in the direction of a more earnest and systematic study of the Word of God. Our colleges, our schools of lower grade, our churches, our Sunday-schools, our Endeavor Societies, should all be keyed up to this pitch and made to serve the purpose of extending the knowledge of the Word of God among the people. This implies, of course, an open-mindedness in receiving truth as it may disclose itself to us in new and larger aspects and relations. It implies also a catholicity of spirit that tolerates differences of opinion and interpretation in our tentative efforts to discover and appropriate the truth. These conditions constitute the atmosphere in which alone progress in biblical knowledge is possible.

Another line of progress which will commend itself no less forcibly than the one mentioned above, and which should go along with it, hand in hand, is the deepening and development of the life of God in our members. This is the end really towards which biblical knowledge looks, and it has not accomplished its purpose until this end is reached. The tendency of many members of the modern church to be drawn away from their allegiance to Christ and the church, by the various modern substitutes for religion, together with the tide of worldliness that has invaded the church, furnishes ample evidence of the too superficial character of the religious life of a large per cent of our membership. This evil is not to be corrected by a set of arbitrary rules, the violation of which forfeits membership in the churches, or by scolding from the pulpit, or by controversial sermons. The remedy lies in constitutional treatment. There must be a deepening of religious convictions, an enrichment of religious experience, a strengthening of the grasp on things spiritual and eternal, a clearer vision and fuller appropriation of the fundamental facts and truths of the gospel. The very existence of these manifold religious fads and fancies, which are attracting so much popular attention today, argues a diseased condition of the church. Witness also the fairs, festivals and various devices for raising money resorted to by the modern church, which things are an abomination in the sight of the Lord. Would that Christ might be admitted into these churches that He might cleanse them from these abominations as He did the ancient temple! But only Christ can do it. What we mean, therefore, by a deeper religious life, is a more Christly life—a life in which Christ is enthroned at the center. When He is seated in His rightful place on the throne of the heart, whatever is impure and unholy, whatever is contrary to the will and character of God, must depart therefrom. Surely, there is room for progress of this character with all of us, and the sooner and the more earnestly we set ourselves to this task, the better it will be for us individually and for the great cause we represent.

We have never yet attained unto the ideal which our fathers of this Reformation set out to realize—the restoration of the Christianity of Christ and of His apostles. We have made some progress along many lines, but along others we have made little or no progress. It cannot be said that we have a higher ethical standard than our religious neighbors, or that we bring our combined influence to bear more directly than others in bringing about better social conditions, or in overthrowing the intrenched public evils of our day. In discarding party names and party banners, in restoring the New Testament doctrine and ordinances, in pleading for Christian unity and standing for the church universal, in exalting Christ above all creeds and confessions of faith, and in rejecting all other leadership than His, we have done well, and in so doing have made a profound impression upon the religious thought and life of our times. It remains, however, to make this tremendous religious advantage available in securing a higher order of church life, a higher ethical standard in our individual lives, and in securing a more united effort against social wrongs and iniquities. Is it a fact, for instance, that we who plead for the return to Christ have but one sentiment and one voice on the question of the saloon, and that a sentiment and a voice of unwavering and uncompromising hostility? If this be a fact, or if it be true, as we believe it is true, that there is remarkable unanimity of sentiment among us on this question, have we found any way of giving effective expression to this sentiment? The same question might be asked concerning other popular evils. These questions are asked to suggest the need and possibility of progress in the direction of more effective co-operation among ourselves and with all others like-minded, against the gigantic evils of our times. Christianity as a theory, as a doctrine, as a system, may be beautiful and altogether admirable; but it is as a life that it is to win its signal triumphs on the earth, overcoming all pagan faiths and modern cults and establishing itself as the one universal religion of mankind.

This last point suggests the need, which every thoughtful person among us has recognized, of a more perfect mobilization and organization of our forces for effective work. This applies to the local congregations and to all our benevolent, educational and missionary organizations. It is true that organization is not of primary importance; that place belongs to the life. But organization is essential in order that that life shall manifest itself and become an effective and triumphant force in the world. This whole problem needs the best thought of our wisest and most consecrated men. It involves the question of the ministry and other officials in the local organization. It involves the question of colleges, mission boards and religious publishing houses. When we come to see that the great end of religious organizations is to make effective the life of God among men, to convey the water of life to the parched and thirsty lips of perishing humanity, we shall be better prepared to adapt these various organizations to the conditions and needs of our time.

These are only the bold outlines of some of the lines of progress which we believe claim the attention of the Disciples of Christ to-day. It will be our purpose, from time to time, to fill out these outlines with more definite and practical suggestions looking to specific needs. The substance of which we have here said is that we have not yet apprehended that for which we were apprehended by Christ Jesus, and that the Lord by His providence is calling upon us to gird ourselves anew and go forward in the accomplishment of our high mission.

THE FORTH COMMANDMENT AND SUNDAY OBSERVANCE.

There is no specific reference in the fourth word of the Decalogue to the Lord's day, but the underlying principle and purpose apply to a Sabbatic institution for all time. The fourth is the only precept in the moral constitution of Judaism on which Christianity has wrought any change, and that chiefly is a change of form. The Ten Words belong to the eternal verities, the immutable principles of the divine government, and can therefore undergo no essential change from age to age.

The specific day has been changed—the particular seventh portion of time designated by the old Sabbatic law—but the principle upon which the provision is based of a seventh portion of time devoted to physical rest and spiritual service remains the same under Christ as under Moses. Christ changed the special rest day from the seventh to the first because he changed one of the purposes of the day—one of its basic and actuating motives. The Jewish Sabbath commemorated the completion of the works of creation in six days and the rest of God on the seventh. The Lord's day commemorates the new spiritual creation in the resurrection of Christ. The day was therefore changed, but not the principle of the consecration of a seventh portion of time to the holy uses of worship and religious culture. It would be good Scripture and in accordance with the mind of Christ to say, "Remember the Lords day to keep it holy."

There is no special New Testament authority for keeping the first day of the week, but evidence to show that the first Christians, being Jews, observed both days for a time—the seventh day from force of habit and respect for the authority of Moses and the sanctity of the law, which they believed was still in force; and the first day to celebrate the Passion in the Lord's Supper, and the resurrection in the Lord's day. After the destruction of Jerusalem and the disruption of the Jewish state, keeping the Sabbath fell into disuse and the Lord's day, by the influence of the Apostle Paul and the influx of Gentile converts into the church, was gradually substituted in its place. By the middle of the second century the Lord's day was universally observed by the Christian world.

The Sabbatic principle of the fourth commandment recognizes first and is based upon the necessity of a day of physical rest. "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; the seventh day is a Sabbath unto the Lord thy God, in it thou shalt not do any work." Modern science and experience have shown the wisdom of this provision by demonstrating that the laborer must have at least one seventh of his time for rest to recuperate the wasted cells and tissues of his body. A scientific commission, consisting of eminent physicians, was appointed by the House of Commons, in England, to investigate this question from the standpoint, not of Scripture, but of medical and physiological science, which in its report, expressed the unanimous opinion that the workingman and the brain toiler alike required thirty-six hours rest in seven days to maintain his health and do his best work.

One day in seven is imperative for worship and spiritual culture. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." A day for rest and serious joy designed is indispensable for moral and religious health. History has invariably indicated the ways of God to men as those ways are declared in Scripture, and in nothing more manifestly than in the history of Sunday observance in its relation to the life and growth of the church. It has been shown that the church cannot exist and continue to prosper without the sanctification of the first day of the week. When the Church of Christ is fighting for this day it is fighting for its own existence. The continental church, a combination of infidelity, superstition and worldliness, with its logical adjunct and promoter, the Continental Sunday, should make up together an impressive object-lesson to the conscience of American Christianity. It is a sad fact that this secular holiday on the continent of Europe in which the poor work that the rich may play, has more than entered the thin end of the wedge into American civilization. Over large areas of our country the curse of the Continental Sunday is in full possession. The cities are shamelessly given up to this kind of Sunday desecration, and the small towns are rapidly following suit. What proportion of American communities execute the Sunday closing law against the saloon? How many of them have sufficient backing of sound public opinion to stop Sunday horse racing and Sunday baseball, and how many state legislatures have passed laws against Sunday railroad excursions, the most demoralizing of them all? An increasing number of stores are keeping open in the smaller towns to catch the country fake who comes in on Sunday to drink whisky and spend his money, and these violators of the law are not being disturbed by the members of the church. The men are so busy during the week that they cannot find time to get a shave till Sunday morning, and so the barber must work on Sunday for their accommodation, and the women are so busy they cannot order the meat for Sunday's dinner till Sunday morning, and so the butcher must lose his day of rest for their benefit; and what shall be said of Sunday visiting among American Christians and church members? Multitudes of people who profess Christianity are given up to this form of Sunday dissipation. They drive or cycle into the country to eat a big dinner and enjoy themselves socially instead of eating the Lord's Supper at home with the brethren, where they ought to be. Is it a legitimate form of appreciation of the sanctity of the Lord's Supper and the Lord's day to go visiting people of the world on Sunday, or other church members, to keep them from doing their duty on the Lord's day? Brethren, we need to cultivate a Sunday conscience. "Remember the Lord's day to keep it holy!"

CHRISTIANITY NOT WANING.

It seems to be taken for granted in certain quarters that attendance in Protestant churches is on the decline and the sayings of certain ministers and the figures of certain denominational yearbooks are cited in support of the opinion. This may be true in a certain sense, but without care may lead to wrong conclusions, such as the decadence of Christianity, etc. If the attendance upon certain occasions or times for public worship is declining it must be remembered that the number of churches, chapels, missions, Bible-schools and Endeavor Societies at home and abroad are increasing with great rapidity; that religious conventions were never so numerous nor so largely attended in the world's history; that the demand for missions, missionaries, Bibles, and religious literature is greater than ever before, and these things substantially prove that Christianity is not on the decline. But as to any decline, real or apparent, in the attendance of the churches, the following reasons have been given in explanation:

Dr. Hillis, the pastor of Plymouth church, in Brooklyn, says the American people are too tired to attend church. D. L. Moody says that in too many cases the Bible has been crowded out by lectures on literature or wrangling over theological problems. Another prominent pastor ascribes it to the higher criticism, and another to the apostasy of life among professed believers. Men of the world complain, he says, "that members of churches are often inferior in probity and honor to men like themselves. We send missionaries to the heathen, but in the hold of the ship they sail in we place, side by side, boxes of Bibles and barrels of rum."

A prominent journal in New York thinks that "too many extraneous and unnecessary features have been introduced into the service;" that the tendency is to relegate the sermon and to emphasize the music, etc.

To this list of explanations, each doubtless true in part, the editor of the Iowa Capital adds the suggestion that more "constant preaching of the old-fashioned gospel" would be a helpful factor in the solution of this problem and very happily concludes his editorial with the following wise hint:

The church has been grandly successful in much that it has undertaken. It has failed only when it has sought to improve on those things which were the essence of perfection from their very inception. When man-made theology is made subordinate to the unqualified preaching and practicing of that religion which the Apostle James declared to be "pure and undefiled," it will not be necessary always to go out into the byways and hedges to compel them to come to church. The problem will then be how to properly care for the increased attendance.

Now that Christianity could make any kind of headway against such obstacles as have been cited or hinted, or even subsist at all under such heavy weights, is a greater wonder than any observable decline in church attendance, and this it would not do but for its divinity in origin, in history and in human experience. And if it can only succeed in laying aside these weights and the sin with which it is so constantly and stubbornly beset—the sin of division in its adherents—it would soon cover the earth. There is, then, a great work within as well as without the churches to be done before the fullness of Christianity can ever be realized on this earth.

Questions and Answers.

What do you understand is meant by "the kingdom of God is within you?" (Luke 17:21.)

There is a difference of opinion among Bible commentators as to whether the phrase "within you" should not be rendered "in the midst of you." Whichever view we may take of that question, however, the connection seems to indicate that the kingdom of God is here conceived of by Christ as something internal rather than external. It "cometh not with observation: neither shall they say, Lo, here! or There! for lo, the kingdom of God is within you." If the proper rendering be "in the midst of you," then the thought is that the kingdom of God, as represented in Christ, was already among them. The kingdom of Christ had its existence on earth first in Him, and worked out through Him among His disciples. If we take the rendering "within you," the thought would seem to be that this kingdom of God, which had its highest exemplification in Christ, was beginning to work in the hearts of His disciples as an internal, spiritual force, molding their lives and characters. In either case, therefore, it is the subjective or internal phase of the kingdom that is here referred to.

In our public schools children are now taught to read before they are taught the alphabet. They are also taught to sing before they learn the scale. May they not on the same principle become Christians before they know the alphabet of Christianity? Should not men also be taught to live Christianity first, then learn its first principles afterwards?

Yes, children may feel the power of Christ's influence and experience the love of Christ without understanding what we usually mean by the first principles of the gospel. It is a mistake which many parents make of holding their children back from confessing Christ because it is known that the children have not mastered many of the facts or principles of the gospel. These can be learned afterward. The main thing is that they have confidence in Christ; that they have learned to love Him and are willing to commit their young lives to His control. The rest will come in due season.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: — As treasurer of one of our city churches I am at present at work on the new year's finances, and I have run across the following proposition in soliciting from one of the brethren, which I refer to you for elucidation. The brother writes a letter which clearly sets forth the proposition and therefore I can do no better than to quote from it. After declining to subscribe for the new year because of sickness in the family he says: "I will take the liberty of giving advice how to save money in the Church of Christ, and I think it will be better than money even. You ought not to hire a preacher, because this makes of the church a good and solid sect-church, and this practice never was our Heavenly Father's meaning—as far as I understand his will and Word. The Church of Christ is full of intelligent men and women—much more intelligent than the apostles or disciples of old—and yet they think, falsely, that they can't speak in the church—can't tell unconverted people the way of salvation and how to live and grow in the faith, although they have a written Testament for a guide. It is not the ears of the people that need touching so much as the hearts, and if God's people could believe his Word and promises and the power of the Spirit, they would have equal power with Stephen and Peter and the rest of the disciples. And further, if intelligent Christians would practice according to 1 Cor. 12:14 they would make our local church in the city the liveliest and most powerful point of worship in the land." Now this brother is a most lovable man, and is not to be classed with church cranks in general, and I would therefore that you could help him to see the error of his way. M.

The fundamental mistake in this brother's proposition and in his conception of the church and its needs seems to be the idea that any Christian without special training and preparation for the work is qualified to set forth the claims of the gospel and to press it upon the attention and the faith of the people in these times. He would not suppose that any one should practice medicine without studying both the human system and the science of medicine. He would not claim that any one was capable of practicing law and defending the rights of men or of the state without having made a special study and preparation for such a work. Is the soul of man less intricate than the body? And is the gospel less profound in its nature and more capable of being properly understood and applied by an untutored mind than the law? Jesus did not think so, for he selected and trained twelve men who should be teachers of his gospel after his departure, and these were to prepare and instruct others for the same work, and so on in endless succession until the present time. Another mistake of the brother is that he seems to overlook the special supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit referred to in the chapters which he mentions, which we have no right to claim or expect now. This is not said to discourage the active participation of the membership generally, as far as possible, in mutual edification, which is a matter greatly to be desired and sought after. No church should be wholly dependent upon an ordained preacher of the gospel for its public worship; but we would discourage the idea, sometimes advanced, that the church can afford to dispense with a qualified and trained ministry specially devoted to the work of preaching the gospel and of guiding the churches in their spiritual growth and activities.

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Dec. 13th.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: Many members, one body; diversity of gifts, unity of Spirit; the New Testament church is the higest exemplification of E pluribus unum, or, "out of many, one."

In the two passages above cited the apostle Paul illustrates his conception of the unity of the church by the unity which exists between the different members of the human body. This is certainly a very high ideal of unity and one that is far from realization yet in the church universal. Indeed, it may be doubted whether any single local congregation fulfills this ideal of unity. This does not, however, nullify the obligation to make this ideal the goal towards which we are to struggle.

One of the most difficult things in church life is to get the members to realize that to each one of them has been given a certain gift or ability of some kind, and that in the use of this particular gift on the part of each member the unity of the church is conserved and its edification promoted. We know this is so in the human body. Each member of the body has its special function, and it is only when these several members fulfill their respective functions that the body enjoys its normal health. Nor is there the slightest schism or strife between the members of our bodies. Each is content to fulfill its own function, and in doing so it serves the welfare of every other member of the body. It should be so in the church. Members differ in their peculiar gifts. This is well. It would be a great misfortune if all the members had precisely the same temperaments, the same tastes, the same gifts. Such a church could hardly be self sustaining. If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If it were all hands, where were the walking? If it were all tongue where would be the prayer-meeting?

It is not improbable that there are members present in the prayer meeting tonight who have never definitely decided what their work in the church is, or who have not even so much as been impressed with the idea that the Lord expects them to render any special service in His kingdom. What use are they in the body, then? When a member of the human body ceases to be used, it soon becomes paralyzed and incapable of use. Is it not so in the church? A church is strong just in proportion as its members recognize their special work and do it faithfully. A good pastor is one who helps his members to find out what they can do and puts them at it.

The church is the ideal society; it is the city of God on earth. It secures that unity of fellowship and of service which has been the dream of idealists and prophets of all ages. "Whether one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; or one is honored, all the members rejoice with it." What an ideal society is that! Suppose the church universal was such a society—what would be the result? No more divisions, no more strifes, no more schisms, no more sectarian animosities; but instead, mutual love, mutual fellowship, mutual care for each other, until there should be no poor and lonely saints left to languish and die, uncared for, unwept, unsung.

But the speediest way to realize this ideal in the church universal is for each local congregation to try to come up to this high ideal of unity, where all the members are working, each one doing that which he is best qualified to do, and all of them helping each other by their mutual service, and forbearing one another in love, the strong bearing the infirmities of the weak, the older giving loving counsel and admonition to the younger, the poor being ministered to according to their needs, the sick being visited, the tempted being encouraged and strengthened, and all recognizing their common headship in Christ and deriving their life and power for service from Him.

Why should not each congregation make this ideal of the apostle its ideal, and begin at once the efforts to make it real?

PRAYER.

O Thou Lord of life, of whose body we are members, we thank Thee for the possibility and the glorious ideal of the unification of mankind in Thee. We thank Thee for the church which Thou hast called out from the world to exemplify the kind of society which Thou wouldst establish on earth. Forgive our shortcomings, heal our divisions, unite the scattered forces of Thy church militant in closer fellowship with Thee and with one another. And, we beseech Thee, O Lord, that Thou wouldst help us each to find what particular work Thou wouldst have us do, and do it faithfully, that we may be truly members one of another and of Thy living body, so that, accomplishing Thy will here on earth, we may share in Thy glory in the world to come. For Thy name's sake. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

One of the most difficult things in an editor's life, perhaps, is the planning for his paper a year ahead. It is difficult enough to plan for each week's issue when the amount of matter received is many times more than can be published. But when one comes to look a year ahead and try to think of all the interests that must be served, of all the tastes that it is right to consider, of all the different kinds of readers whom he is under obligation to try to please and to serve, the task is a herculean one. The most that can be done, however, in this respect, is to decide on the general outline and to fill in as the emergencies may seem to require through the progress of the year. This is the time of year when editors are wrestling with that problem, and when they need the sympathy and prayers of their readers. The fact that it is impossible to find any solution that would please every one makes it all the more difficult. But we have generally found our readers reasonable and disposed to acquiesce in our plans and policies. We have no doubt this will be the case the coming year.

We will take our readers into our confidence far enough here to say that we are planning to make the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST for 1900 one of the very best years in its history. It seems to us altogether fitting that the closing year of the century should be signalized by a forward movement, both in the excellence of our paper and the increase of its circulation. We are planning for both these ends. We are securing a number of our ablest writers to treat a number of practical and vital questions during the coming year, and make a partial announcement in another place of the writers and topics. No backward step is contemplated, but contrariwise, we must greet the incoming century with the ablest corps of writers and the largest number of readers which the paper has ever enjoyed. The fitness of this every one will recognize. We owe it to the 19th century, which has witnessed so much progress, and we owe it to the incoming 20th century, which is destined to witness still greater progress, that this be done.

If the work of planning for the contents of the paper a year ahead be difficult, what shall be said concerning the task of convincing the people that they ought to read the paper? What methods are open to editors and publishers for increasing the circulation of their papers? They cannot honorably resort to lottery, lying nor legerdemain for this purpose. Religious editors, at least, like to be honest, open and perfectly frank with their readers. They must try to treat everybody alike. They cannot publish one price in the paper and have a private understanding with their agents in the field and with the preachers to accept subscriptions at a lower price. At least we do not feel justified in resorting to that method. We have a theory that both editors and publishers of religious journals should transact their business in harmony with the principles of the religion which they are supposed to represent. We believe our readers will generally agree with us in this theory and in our effort to carry it out. It may be a bit old-fashioned, but there are some old-fashioned ideas that we cannot afford to give up.

After all, then, it seems that we are shut up to the straightforward and strictly businesslike method of fixing the lowest price at which we can hold the paper up to the standard of excellence required and pay our honest debts, and having the same price for every state and every community and every reader, except the reduction which we make in favor of ministers of the gospel, which may or may not be wise. This reduction is made on the ground that ministers interest themselves more or less in the circulation of the paper, mentioning it from their pulpits and otherwise assisting the agent in securing subscriptions. Having fixed the price, a publisher can offer a commission for agents, or a premium to individual subscribers, such as he feels he can afford, in order to bring the paper before the attention of the people. This we are doing, but when this is done we feel that we are dependent, in a large measure, upon the little kindly offices of our readers, who feel that the paper is doing a good work wherever it goes, to speak a word for it to their friends and neighbors, and, in the absence of an agent, to forward any subscriptions to us which they can secure. Judging from our experience in the past, there are, no doubt, thousands of readers in our churches who, on seeing a few copies of the paper and catching its spirit, would be glad to become permanent readers. And so, after all, the editor and publisher and reader must co-operate and form a sort of fellowship of service to accomplish the best results. We have had much of this in the past, and we bespeak a larger measure of it in the future.

Reformation of the Nineteenth Century

NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE CHRISTIAN WOMAN'S BOARD OF MISSIONS.

First Decade.

LOIS A. WHITE.

Then they that feared the Lord spake one with another; and the Lord hearkened and heard and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name (Malachi 3:16 R. V).

Not until "we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is," will it be possible to read and comprehend the only complete, accurate history—the Lord's "book of remembrance"—of the speaking "one with another" of his people that he has used, not only to bring about the organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, but to cherish and to advance its potency as a factor in the Lord's plan for the evangelization of the world. Woman's much-maligned wordiness, consecrated and trained for Christ, is used of the Lord in his service to the blessing of both the message giver and receiver. It is possible, however, from our imperfectly written and read human records to gather some helpful lessons—some apples of gold for the "pictures of silver" in this Silver Anniversary Year of the association.

Whether we were beside ourselves, it is unto God; or whether we are of sober mind, it is unto you. For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that One died for all, therefore all died; and he died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died and rose again (2 Corinthians 5:13-15).

Decades of history may be marked off distinctly by dates on a calendar. In every phase of that which occupies them they will blend. It was in the hither half of the second decade before the C. W. B. M. had generally taken as its motto: "The love of Christ constraineth us." Now it will ever abide and lead because of its adoption being so well founded on truth, as shown by the history of the association.

Many months if not years before its organization the twofold cord of the constraining love of Christ was drawing from far and near those who were to be its members and intelligent advocates.

Formally speaking, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is an association having for its object the maintaining of preachers and teachers for religious instruction, the encouraging and cultivating a missionary spirit and missionary efforts in the churches, the disseminating of missionary intelligence and the securing of systematic contributions for missionary purposes; and also the establishing and maintaining of educational institutions. Organized, however, as it was in faith in our Heavenly Father, it is a tree of his planting. Like all things planted under divine guidance and blessing, it possesses those elements of growth which carry results far beyond anything that could have been even dimly outlined in the vision of the servants directed to plant and water.

Viewing the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in the light of a superstructure, erected on divine foundation, we can well say that the seventy-five women who organized it in Cincinnati, O., in October, 1874, "builded better than they knew."

The matchless love of Christ that, along with the mercy of God, led to repentance all who have entered his kingdom, constrained his handmaidens to contemplate and draw near to this Savior, who even counted not his life dear that he might redeem unto himself "a peculiar people, zealous of good works." In the passing years of service the divine relationship has been strengthened until Christ's followers, in responding to his love for us, have a warm enough love for him to be a constraining influence upon us to no longer live unto ourselves, but unto him who for our sakes died and rose again.

In the variety of statistics that may be considered as tabulating the make up of this board and the record of the labors progressing under its auspices, never forget that the vivifying power is expressed in the bit of God's Word which is our motto: "The love of Christ constraineth us."

Up to a quarter of a century ago perhaps no religious body held more conservative views than ours in regard to the participation of women in the work or services of the church, nor more fully conformed its practice to those ideas. Without any creed-article on the subject there was a universal custom of prohibition. Here and there a woman ripe in years and godliness and wisdom offered a prayer in devotional meetings; here and there, among the churches, was a woman's prayer-meeting; but further than this nothing was expected of women, nothing desired by them. But women's missionary societies had appeared among our religious neighbors and were being observed with interest by some among us. That may, in some measure, account for the women taking up the work.

The cause for divine enterprise of this kind appealing to them is not difficult to trace. The first General Missionary Convention of the Disciples had for its recorded purpose, "A more general and efficient co-operation in the Bible cause, in the missionary cause, in the education cause." The call said: "Let the brethren from different parts of the United States come together, cultivate each other's acquaintance and in fear of the Lord consider the welfare of Zion and the means to be employed in extending the boundaries of the Messiah's kingdom." Those responding assembled in the Christian church at the corner of Eighth and Walnut Streets. That was the home of one of the oldest, strongest and most historic congregations in the Reformation, and the mother church in Cincinnati. The city itself was then, geographically and in other respects, the center of our brotherhood. It is said the sort of men who, with intelligence and zeal and full of the best aims and hopes, inaugurated this great assembly, who executed so well its high task and gave by their action enduring form and life to our great, world-wide enterprises in the gospel, were the most perfect embodiments, in every sense, of our great plea. Is it strange that the more than one hundred and fifty men of that class, from eleven states, representing considerably over one hundred churches, should become in their families, congregations and wide circles of influence the zealous sowers of the seed that in twenty-five years was to bring the organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions? C. L. Loos wrote of one 1849 attendant: "What a man was Henry D. Palmer, whose advocacy in Tennessee of apostolic Christianity antedates the Campbells, endowed with a bravery and a spirit of sacrifice that rank him among the noblest of men. He was a man of God, whose like we seldom see; great in wisdom, eminent in piety, wondrously consecrated in all his being by a lifelong study, fully conversant with the doctrine of Christ, mighty, singularly eloquent, often, as a preacher." A granddaughter of the man thus endowed and consecrated, Mrs. O. A. Burgess, was the first treasurer of the C. W. B. M. and is now its president.

In Louisville, twenty years after that wonderful convention, whose chief object was the organization of a general, world-embracing missionary enterprise, was urged the incorporation in the new "plan" of a provision for such a system of auxiliaries for women as existed in the denominations. But though it was done, the object passed out of sight and mind, I opine, because it was not the fullness of time for the Lord's plan, the C. W. B. M., formed with distinctly separate lines of organization, while gratefully acknowledging the strongest of Christian family ties and the source of impelling influence to world-wide evangelism.

None but the recording angel can reveal the names of all who were thinking and praying about this matter. Human registration can only select one here and there. In writing the historical sketch of this board, Miss Elmira J. Dickinson, Eureka, Ill., who was so interested in the work and conversant therewith as to have oaganized in her own town a local missionary society before there was a national association to which it could be auxiliary, states: "The inaugurator of organized missionary work among the women of the Church of Christ is Mrs. Caroline N. Pearre." Of the beginnings of this matter Sister Pearre herself testifies: "On the 10th of April, 1874, about ten o'clock in the morning, at the close of my private devotions, the thought came to me. I promptly conferred with Bro. Munnell, corresponding secretary of the General Missionary Convention. He responded at once: 'This is a flame of the Lord's kindling, and no man can extinguish it.' I then began to write letters to our ladies, from whom I received favorable answers."

Near the middle of May Mrs. Pearre organized a society in her home church in Iowa City, Ia. About that time a letter that she had written concerning it to Mrs. J. K. Rogers was sent to J. H. Garrison, who published it in his paper, The Christian, with an editorial fervently commending it to his readers.

In a visit that Isaac Errett made to Iowa City in June, he talked the matter all over with Mrs. Pearre and was so thoroughly interested as to write a vigorous leader entitled, "Help Those Women," and send it for the next issue of his paper, the Christian Standard. It was his proposition that the sisters hold a convention on the following October (at the same time with the General Convention at Cincinnati) to organize a Woman's Missionary Board. Through the columns of the Standard and the Christian this was kept before the people and the arrangements made.

The response to this call brought together about seventy-five sisters, at whose meeting Mrs. R. R. Sloan, of Ohio, presided. After a full explanation of the purpose of this meeting, by Mrs. Pearre, and the presentation of plans for future work, the matter was very prayerfully and fervently considered. The following day the constitution was adopted, and thus on October 22, 1874, was organized the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, with headquarters located in Indianapolis, and national officers chosen from that locality. A few years later the association was incorporated under the laws of the state of Indiana.

[Articles of this class depend on the pens of many who have helped to make the history now briefly reviewed. Many of these cannot be named, but the writings of Mrs. Maria Jameson, Miss M. Lucilla Payne, Mrs. C. N. Pearre and Miss Elmira J. Dickinson should receive special credit.]

COMMENTS ON AND EXCERPTS FROM THE CONGREGATIONAL COUNCIL IN BOSTON.

BY REV. DR. MICHAEL BURNHAM.

Perhaps you will sit at the feet of Fairbairn with a little greater satisfaction to hear him utter sentences like these in his council sermon: "Jesus, like one who lived in time, yet who belonged to eternity, speaks in the very face of disaster and in the very hour and article of death of founding a church, of building a city, against which the gates of hell could not prevail." "The constituent elements of the church are two: they are the Savior, who saves that he may govern, and the man, who is saved in order that he may obey. These are the essentials; all else is accidental." "The essence of the church lies in the Savior who reigns. Where he is there it is, and where he reigns the people are free. Two things fill me with wonder and astonishment. One of them is the supremacy, the absoluteness of the divine energy that said, 'I will build,' and the second is the material out of which he built." "Jesus took no man out of society when founding his church; he left him as he stood. He changed the man, and through the man all society." "In the church there are three and only three postulates. There is, first, the person who can attract, control, command. There are, secondly, the persons who can be attracted, controlled, commanded. There is, thirdly, the medium which brings the two together and through which the supreme person works and in which the subordinate persons live. But the third element, the medium, is only a form of the other two. The power by which atom acts on atom has its counterpart in the power by which person acts upon person. It is through persons that Christ reaches man; it is by persons that Christ's church is constituted." "A visible church, taken as the synonym of Christ, would be the visibility of the infinite, and what were a visible infinity but infinity, bound and fettered with all the limitations of finitude." "I would not," he says, "undervalue great historic churches. I never feel the greatness of Christ to be so great as when I face these churches and think that he made them, that they so fail of his service, and that in spite of that failure he still loves and still condescends to use and bless them." "Think you," he says, "the church could have stood in Russia in the strength of an imperial czar, in the strength of an abhorrent filoque, if there had been no divine Consoler? Think you the Roman Church would have lived spite of her sacraments and her priesthood, her altars and her music, her splendid history and her spacious cathedrals, had it not been for the saints Christ made, for the martyrs she honors? for not Mary the Virgin, but Mary's Son gives to her all her dignity and all her place. And in the Anglican Church what is it that makes its power, its love for its orders and its place, but the desire to make articulate what it conceives to be the person of the Christ? You see, then, that there is the magnanimity of Christ; he consents to live in communities that vainly call themselves Presbyterian or Independent, Baptist or Methodist, and there is a still greater humility in his being ready to dwell in proud communities which speak of themselves as imperial, infallible or apostolic. O, I sometimes think that the hardest text in Scripture is, 'He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh.' There he reigns in them all, tolerating their very errors for the sake of the loving works they do. Christ is sovereign in his own church. The church must be Christ-like—Christ's incarnate priesthood, with the function of prophecy, with the function of kinghood. She must be the habitation of the Holy Spirit. God must dwell in her and be her life."

Now in such statements we are coming toward an authority that binds us. But rise a little higher and not even the eloquence of Fairbairn, with all its power, swayed that assembly like the utterances of these two men, Jones and Forsyth, whom now I will note. Rev. J. D. Jones, of Bournemouth, England, whose argument was this: "Christianity is not one religion among the others; it is the only religion, the only absolute religion. Christianity was not only founded by Jesus; it is based on him. This revelation, this salvation and this inspiration are all inseparably bound up with the person of Christ. Jesus was the revelation himself. He did not simply preach the truth, he preached himself as the truth. Christianity offers to the world a salvation made possible by Christ. Any religion that seeks to be universal must recognize the terrible effect of sin. Only two religions do this—Buddhism and Christianity. The Buddhist plan is salvation by self-control; the Christian plan is salvation by trust in a person. The fear of hell or the desire for heaven is an insufficient dynamic. It may produce the prudent, calculating religionist, but it can never produce the true Christian. Those who search the ancient books of the East to discover precepts similar to those in the Sermon on the Mount are ignorant of what Christianity is. Christianity is not simply a morality, but a gospel. The ethical revivals in which we are living are needed, but the evangel must not be sacrificed and Christianity treated as if it were simply an ethical system."

Such presentation of truth swayed that immense audience. They would not let him take his seat until he had come forward in response to their applause.

But let us take still another, Dr. P. T. Forsyth, of Cambridge, Eng., who if possible roused greater enthusiasm by the presentation of truth like this: "Without a real authority Protestantism is not only a blunder, but deserves to be a failure. We need an authority more than aught else. The final seat of authority for human society is in the cross of Christ as the Forgiver and Redeemer. The seat of authority must be sought in the ethical direction rather than in such quarters as would usually be understood as rational. What we need is, not so much authority for what to believe as an authority with power to compel into act what we already believe—an authority for the freedom of the will rather than of thought. Being social, this moral authority must be historic. It is at the focus, not of the age, but of the race. It is no more limited by the time than by the individual. The moral authority which is final must be, not only historic as a matter of fact, but as a matter of principle. If the seat of authority be thus historic and not mystic, social and not individual, ethical and not merely rational, it must stand forth either as an institution or as a person in an act. But only a soul can rule a soul, only a will redeem a captive will, only a living person be a source of grace. The church is but the channel of grace, and not the seat of authority. But if the final authority be not in an institution, then it cannot be a canon, which is in the nature of an institution. Even the Bible as a whole is not, in strictness of thought, the final authority. The final authority is the gospel in the Bible, which is Jesus Christ and him as crucified. That is within the Bible, but it is not to be got out so much by dissection as by distillation. The gospel must do for the Bible what the Bible did for the church. The Bible has an authority that judges the church and the gospel has an authority that judges the Bible. Christ in the Bible judges the Bible as the conscience in us judges us. Both Bible and church may be the means of our faith, but neither is the ground of our faith. If Protestantism have any meaning, it is that the ground of our faith is identical with the object of our faith, which is God reconciling the world in the cross of Christ. There is but one authority, ethical, social, historic, personal, living and present. It is revealed, absolutely given and forever miraculous to human thought. It is the grace of God to us sinners in the cross of Christ. That is the final authority as being the supreme moral act of the supreme moral being. All morals are but academic which fail to recognize that the greatest fact in social ethics is also the most formidable and intractable. It is the fact of sin and guilt. The Redeemer from moral death is the seat of authority for all mankind, in their affairs as in their faith. The ethics of the future must be the explication of the cross, and of the cross understood as a gospel and not as an ideal, as an atonement and not as a classic sacrifice. The seat of Christ's absolute authority is [neither in our wonder, fascination nor gratitude. He is not King because he personalizes the divine life. Nor is he our Master because he incarnates the holy law, for that would be but condensing in a personality the very power our sin has most reason to dread. Holiness becomes even more terrible in the Holy One. But he redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. He satisfied for us that holy law which our sin could break but never unseat, whose wounded claim no future obedience or even penitence of ours could ever extinguish, which at once lifts us from the dust and grinds us to powder, which is our dignity to touch and our misery to remember, on which the most Titanic defiance dashes in vain, and which masters our loudest freedom with a quiet, inextinguishable irony and a slow, inevitable judgment. That was our absolute master as Christ found us, and that was the judgment that he absorbed in his holy love. Because he took man's judgment he became man's judge. Because he exhausted the curse he acquired the monoply of blessing. He is absolutely and forever supreme because our disordered nature is in him redeemed. And the moral authority of society has at the last only an evangelical base."

It was this masterly address that roused that audience almost to the point of creed-making; it was creed-making in the best and grandest sense. Such expressions are for the times, and they are needed.

I must take in brief outline one more address—that of Rev. Alfred Cave, D. D., of Hackney College, London, on "The Living Christ." I had heard him on the previous Sabbath in an address in Tremont Temple, which he was pleased to call "Some Meditations on the Christ of Calvary;" but he spoke to the council on "The Living Christ" with the statement: "There are three aspects of Christ, the confusion of which has done a good deal of mischief. There is the Christ of history, and there is the Christ of dogma, and there is the Christ of experience. History is of two kinds, artistic and scientific. The artistic type is rather literary than critical. The scientific is laborious in research. By the Christ of history I mean the life of Jesus as told by the historian, whether his aim be literary or scientific. By the Christ of dogma I mean what Christ is to the Christian thinker. It is the intellectual belief which constitutes the Christ of dogma. The Christ of experience belongs to man as man, not to man as historian or to man as theologian. Of the three Christs, the only indispensable Christ is the Christ of experience. It is his presence alone which can make tolerable the Christ of history or the Christ of dogma. He misrepresents the Christ of history who does not know the Christ of experience. A scientific picture of Christ which emanates from a man who does not know the Christ of experience is unscientific. The Christ of dogma is only useful to him who knows the Christ of experience. Experience and no doctrine is better than doctrine and no experience."

"How are we to know the living Christ? The problem is serious and vital. It is a problem upon which every true preacher must come to a decision. And when the living Christ comes to a man he comes to stay. From the moment we have determined to follow the living Christ we have a new and an ever-enlarging experience. In a growing fellowship with the living Christ we have a touchstone of what to believe and what not to believe. We know there is a soul in the universe, and materialism dies out. There we settle controversies; there we rejoice in friendship; there we have an unfailing guide into the great future."

It is no wonder that thoughts like these stirred deeper than the speculative element the hungry heart of that vast concourse of scholars and preachers, men and women, representative in the churches. I have not time to refer to a multitude—I had almost said—of great men and great thoughts, on great occasions, on great papers, that filled the hours of the morning, the afternoon and the evening—living men in contact with and from different points of a living world. But they emphasized again and again what Dr. Bevan, in my pulpit in Pilgrim Church, emphasized as the summing up in application of his sermon the Sabbath following the American Board meeting in Providence these three facts the necessity in such a day as this for the church to remember:

1. Her own need of personal holiness.
2. The unity of the church underneath all external differences—the unity, actual unity, of the true church of Jesus Christ.
3. The great need of the world to which the church must awaken in days like these.

I would myself add this fact crowded upon us: the great obligation of the English-speaking world, with the English tongue, to carry the Word of God to the ends of the world. Friends, we need not fear—rather let us hail—

1. Reverent scholarship.
2. The trend to the simplest statements of the truth.
3. The fact that all learning pays its homage and lays its glory, all learning that is worth the name, at the feet of Jesus Christ.

Dr. Storrs, in his masterly address on "The Permanent Motive in Missionary Work," before the council, gave thoughts cogent in proof of a need of unity and of the power of the appeal of the great needy world to the church, which she must heed when he declared, "No one need exaggerate, every one should recognize, the weakness and wretchedness, the exposure and the peril of human society." "I suppose that every one who has ever stood on the heights above Naples, at the Church of St. Gennaro on the way to St. Elmo, has noticed, as I remember to have noticed, that all the sounds coming up from that gay, populous, brilliant, fascinating city, as they reached the upper air met and mingled on the minor key. There were the voices of traffic and the voices of command and the voices of affection, and the voices of rebuke and the shouts of sailors and the cries of the itinerant venders in the street and the chatter and the laugh of childhood, but they all came up into this indistinguishable moan in the air. That is the voice of the world in the upper air, where there are spirits to hear it. That is the cry of the world for help. And here is the answer to that cry: a song of triumph and glorious expectation, taking the place of the moan in the village, in the city, in the great community, men and women out of whom multitudes of devils have been cast, as out of him of old, sitting clothed and in their right mind at the feet of Jesus."

"Let us not forget to cry the recoverableness to God of every person and every people, if the divine energies be rightly used. Let us not forget that the gospel of Christ is the power at which men laugh and say, 'You are trying to quarry mountains with sunbeams, you are trying to lift masses of masonry with ærial or, at best, silken threads.' It is the gospel of Christ which is to be the power to lift mankind and glorify God in all the continents in all the earth. A disciple said, 'I go afishing.' Likewise said they all. It seems strange that even after that miracle which has shot its radiance everywhere over the history of the world any disciple should have had that endurance. Shall we, after the ascension and when the skies are still glowing with it, after Pentecost has opened heavenly principalities and powers to our view and our experience under the shadow of the great white throne that is to be set in heaven—shall we go to building and bargaining, to mining and merchandising, as our chief aim in life, and omit this sublimest service which angels, it seems to me, must bend over the battlements of heaven to see in its progress, and to make their hearts and harps jubilant in our vitality and success?

"O, my friends, let us remember, wheresoever we labor, that our errand is to make this complex, complete, energetic missionary motive more clear to every mind, more thoroughly vigorous and energetic in every heart. Everything else must be postponed. Do not let us spend our strengh in picking the gospel to pieces, seeing if we can't put it together again in better fashion. Do not let us spend our strength in any denominational controversies or collisions. Let us give ourselves with all our power to making this immense missionary motive operative throughout all the churches, throughout and in all Christian hearts, till he shall come whose right it is to reign and take unto himself his great power and rule King of nations as well as King of saints; and let us recognize this as the one truly magnificent errand for man on the earth. Let us be filled with the divine spirit that we may accomplish it the more perfectly. Let us never intonate the service. And if, as we grow older, we grow weary with cares and labors and it may be with sorrow and are disposed sometimes to think that we may now rest, let us remember the word of Arnauld, the illustrious Port Royalist, whom even his passionate enemies, the Jesuits, admitted to be great, when some one said to him, 'You have labored long, now is your time to rest,' and his reply was, 'Rest! Why rest here and now, when I have a whole eternity to rest in?' God in his grace opened that tranquil and luminous eternity to each of us, where we may rest in nobler praise and grander work forevermore, and unto him be all the praise!"

Our Budget.

—See prospectus on our second page.

—Call the attention of your friends to it.

—This is only a partial announcement of the things we are preparing for the coming year.

—If you find something in this bill of fare that whets your mental appetite, mention it to your neighbor and it will probably have the same effect on him.

—We are aiming to make the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST such a religious journal as that no one among us can well afford to be without it, if he wishes to read the best things that are being said and done.

—Mails continue to bring us encouraging words from our friends in every part of the field, and the prospect is bright for a great year's work. If your heart is as our heart, lend us a hand.

—We would call attention to our list of premium offers elsewhere as affording an excellent opportunity for our friends to help themselves while they are helping us double the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST during the year 1900.

—The quotations from the eminent men given in the concluding part of Dr. Burnham's report of the Congregational Council will afford rich reading for the thoughtful. The pre-eminence given to Jesus Christ in that council, and the freedom of spirit manifested, will endear Congregationalists to our readers more than ever.

—We hope our readers, in Missouri especially, will read Dr. Moore's article elsewhere on the Bible College endowment. He is now giving attention to this work, and we have nothing more important before us in Missouri than our educational interests.

—A generous friend has just remembered the Foreign Christian Missionary Society with a gift of $1,000. Such gifts will have to come quick and fast in order to insure the $200,000 for Foreign Missions in this the Silver Jubilee Year of the Foreign Society.

—We are glad to note continued gains in Church Extension receipts, as reported by the corresponding secretary. The receipts for October were $4,213.35, which is a gain of $500 over last October. The receipts for November are $1,872,07, which is a gain of $325 over November, 1898. We thus have $6,000 of the $50,000 which the convention recommended to be raised this year.

—It will be remembered that the Jubilee Convention recommended "giving special emphasis to the annuity feature of our Extension work this year, experience having already demonstrated its extraordinary value. Since October 1st the Board has received $1,500 on the annuity plan this year. The board pays six per cent. to the annuitant, giving a good bond. There is no time wasted in reinvestment, the money is not taxed, and the annuitant can see his money building churches while he lives.

—At the preachers' meeting in this office on last Monday 52 additions were reported in all by the pastors present. Protracted meetings are still in progress at Compton Heights and at the Fourth Church. The pulse of the churches in this city at present is indicative of increasing vigor. At the request of the program committee the editor gave an oral outline review of Dr. Fairbairn's famous book, "The Place of Christ in Modern Theology." The editor places this book among the ablest books of the last quarter of the present century and commends it to the careful consideration of every preacher.

—Nature is both a constructive and a destructive critic of the highest order, and we are now passing into her destructive period. About April next she will begin again her constructive work as a higher critic.

—A crucifix and some coins have been found in the ruins of a Catholic church, destroyed in the great Chicago fire. Now that these relics have passed through the firey trial they will, doubtless, be held doubly sacred by their adorers.

—The fourth annual report of the Board of Ministerial Relief is just to hand and bears many evidences of the good work done during the past year through this agency. This is one of the most tender ministries within the opportunity of the church.

—The "Helping Hand" is the name of one of San Francisco's relief agencies, and judging from its record of work it is well named. Its organ of the same name, a new bi-monthly magazine, reports 800,000 penny dishes of wholesome food distributed to hungry men in 20 months. This seems to be doing remarkably well for so new and young an institution, but this the more justly entitles it to its truly religious name. There is always room for the helping hand in this world.

—From the report of our Home Board secretaries it is evident that our Sunday-schools are beginning to understand the meaning of Boys' and Girls' Rally Day and to observe and enjoy it. See what Secretaries Smith and Smith say about it in this paper, and if your school has not observed the day arrange to do so, as it will do you good and help the cause of Home Missions. The universal testimony from schools that have observed the day is that of an enjoyable and profitable season. Try it.

—We have just learned of the death of Sister Redd, at Platte City, Mo., by which our heart is deeply saddened. Her death resulted from concussion of the brain, caused from a fall at the church in Platte City, Mo., on Thanksgiving day. This news will be deeply regretted by a large circle of friends in Missouri, all of whose hearts will go out in sympathy to Bro. Redd and his family of four children.

—Since writing the above fuller information concerning the death of Sister Redd has come to us, but too late to appear in this paper. It will appear next week.

—On Sunday, November 19th, the church at Mayfield, Ky., where E. W. Thornton preaches, raised $520 for Church Extension. That same evening the church at Fulton, Ky., where Bro. E. M. Waite preaches, raised $130, and the Tenth St. Church, Paducah, raised over $100. The First Church at Paducah is making arrangements to raise an especially large offering this year in order to help reach the $50,000 recommended by the National Convention. Along with reaching the first quarter of a million this year, we should continually remember that we have over 2,700 unhoused churches and that the board can answer but one-third of the demands. Large gifts should continue to come in.

—Rev. Dr. Holland, a prominent Episcopal clerygman of this city, seems to have read "The Man with the Hoe," by Edward Markham, only from some high social pinnacle. He has been criticising the poem from his pulpit and the criticisms as reported in one of our city papers have a decidedly aristocratic setting. Like some others he blames "the man with the hoe" for his condition. He has too many children. Children are begotten in lust. Have hog wallows for homes, etc. Dr. Holland's statements, of course, are to be taken in a qualified sense. He evidently refers to the bottom strata of society in his remarks. But the Doctor should not forget that even here are to be found wrecks of humanity from the upper strata. Edwin Markham's poem may stand opposed to the theory of evolution as held by some theorists, but it certainly and justly places a measure of responsibility in the social, civil and industrial systems of the world, where it belongs, in the light of God's inquiry of Cain.

—It has been almost a year since an article appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST from W. J. Lhamon, sharply criticising some articles which had previously appeared from the pen of J. H. MacEl'Rey, of Trainer, Pa. We have recently received a reply from Bro. MacEl'Rey, explaining that sickness in his family and the loss of his wife had prevented his replying earlier. As the discussion in question related to "Spiritualism," which Bro. Lhamon, of Allegheny City, had criticised and to which Mr. MacEl'Rey had replied, and as nearly a year has elapsed since the discussion appeared in these columns, we have deemed it unwise to renew the discussion; but in justice to Bro. MacEl'Rey we make this explanation as to why no reply has appeared from him.

—An unusual instance of denominational regard for the feelings of another religious body has just occurred in this city. Father O'Reilley has just ordered the noon Angelus to be no longer rung in his church on Sunday on the ground that it interrupts the services of a near-by Methodist Church each Sunday at noon. The Catholic Church requires the Angelus to be rung three times each day, but Father O'Reilley says that according to his view the rule is not so inflexible as to demand its service to the discomfort of others, and such expressions of regard for the feelings of people of another faith deserves more a than passing notice.

—It was not a "horrid" letter that Bro. Lamar wrote for us last week, though the printer made him say so, but a hurried letter. This is not quite so bad an error as that contained in a local paper, whose editor wishing to compliment one of the prominent citizens of the town, who had some military reputation, referred to him as a "battle-scarred veteran." Imagine his chagrin when he saw that the printer made him say "the bottle-scarred veteran!" In attempting to correct this mistake in his next issue, the printer made the editor say: "Of course we wrote the battle-scared veteran!" Then he gave it up and accepted the challenge of a duel! But there is no duel pending with Bro. Lamar, for he says: "Any poor typo who has to wrestle with my manuscript will doubtless think it horrid, though he may not always have as good a chance to say so!" But his chirography is perfection itself compared with some specimens which reach this office which are "horrid" indeed, and sometimes they are "hurried" into the waste-basket! By the way, our Georgia sage "most cordially" seconds the motion to lay on the table, made in our last issue. Are there others? The member from Lexington has the floor.

—Please remember that all reports of meetings should be signed by the writer. We frequently get reports of good meetings that are unsigned. We have learned from experience that it is not safe to publish such reports. We have a fine list of meetings reported on our evangelistic page this week.

—B. C. Stevens, of Marceline, Mo., writes that after 27 years' service in the ministry of the Word he "has succumed to the inevitable" and retired from the ministry of the Word. The "inevitable" referred to is the lack of financial support, and Brother S. says that he knows of 25 other preachers who are wrestling with the same gigantic problem. This is a question with which other religious bodies are also troubled. There seems to be a great change going on in the religious world, and in the readjustment of things some of our good and acceptable preachers are suffering thereby. But it is to be hoped that a better day is at hand for both churches and preachers in the great work of the world's redemption. There is work for all, and all efficient and worthy preachers could be supported if things were properly adjusted. Brother Stevens says that he will devote his time now to writing life insurance, but this, of course, does not mean that he is to quit the Lord's service.

—We begin in this issue the historical sketch of the C. W. B. M., by Miss Lois White. The articles will complete the historical series on "Nine Decades of History."

—We call attention to the movement of President Hardin, of Eureka College, as described in his communication in another column, to prevent Eureka College from again falling deeply into debt. We recommend to all of the churches in Illinois that they send the president word at once that they will furnish their part to make up the annual deficit. It is about time, too, that some one was making Eureka another large donation.

—In response to a request for a statement in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as to where the tra[illegible], "Why I Am a Disciple," could be secured in quantities, we learn from the business manager of the Coming Age, in which the article appeared, that they sent to us the entire edition of the tract and have none for sale. We will add that of those sent to us only a hundred or so yet remain, which we will furnish to those applying for them on terms previously mentioned, namely, the enclosing of a stamp.

—The Sunday-school Times criticises the use of the phrase with which so many prayers are concluded, "for Christ's sake," or "for His sake." The basis of this criticism is that it is essentially a different phrase from that which Jesus instructed his disciples to use, viz., "in my name." The Times thinks it is not the mention of the name of Jesus that gives one acceptance at a throne of grace, but the relation; being in Christ. That is to say, "If ye [being] in my name, shall ask me anything, that will I do," etc. A man may do or suffer for Christ's sake, but when he prays he prays for his own sake and should do it in the name of Christ or in that attitude toward Christ in which he has promised to hear and answer prayer. The criticism of the Times is at least suggestive and will bear investigation. Think about it.

—Good news comes to us from Drake University. A copy of the Des Moines Leader, which has been sent us, contains the gratifying intelligence that the debt of $65,000 which had accumulated against that institution has been liquidated. Some time ago Gen. Drake, the founder of the institution, proposed to give one-half this amount if the other half was raised in cash or interest-bearing notes. This condition has recently been met, and last week Gen. Drake gave his check for $32,500. Chancellor Craig, commenting upon this, says that this recent donation of Gov. Drake made him "feel so good that he immediately proposed enlarging the chapel to seat the students. He authorized the committee to have plans drawn up with an auditorium to seat 1,000 and to push the building to completion as rapidly as possible. The present chapel will be used for needed recitation rooms." Chancellor Craig adds: "This makes more than $150,000 this generous man has given to Drake University, and he has never made his gifts to the university an excuse for refusing other calls for help" Among other liberal donors was A. G. Downing, who with his wife, gave $10,000. As if this were not enough, Bro. D. R. Ewing, of the board of trustees, "added joy to the week by declaring his purpose to erect a library building to cost about $45,000. He has been considering the plans for a long time looking to this end." In a personal note from the Chancellor he says: "With the debt out of the way, new buildings under way and other large gifts in prospect, Drake University gives promise of realizing the growing desires of our people in this region. We have over 700 students now enrolled, and they come from territory as widely extended as Australia, Oregon, Florida, Nova Scotia and Texas." All this is very cheering, indeed, and we rejoice with the friends of Drake in this great forward movement. We trust, too, that the friends of other institutions among us will be stirred up to greater liberality by the good fortune of Drake.

—A brother sends us a clipping from a Chicago paper containing a report of a paper read by Prof. Geo. E. Foster, an instructor in theology in the Baptist Divinity School of the University of Chicago, on "What Constitutes Scripturalness," which was read before the Baptist ministers' conference a few days since. The newspaper account says that "Prof. Foster in his paper, and in defense of it, declared that he had full faith in all the teachings of the Bible, but he did not believe that the men who wrote the Bible were inspired." We would be glad to learn that this statement is a misrepresentation of Prof. Foster's position. We do not know the professor personally, but it seems to us exceedingly improbable that the Baptists would have in their theological department at the university a man who does not believe in the inspiration of the men who wrote the Bible. The actual quotations given, which are few and brief, do not sustain the charge above made. Referring to a theory of inspiration which makes God its "sole author to the exclusion of human activity," he said that this theory of inspiration was "impossible, psychologically, and untrue historically." This, of course, is very different from denying the fact of inspiration. Some of the objections by the other preachers present, however, seem to be based on the ground that the writer of the paper did deny the fact of the inspiration of the Bible. One is in a quandary to know which is the more improbable—that a Baptist ministers' meeting in Chicago should be divided in opinion as to whether the Bible was solely the work of God, without human instrumentality, or whether an instructor in theology at the University of Chicago should deny the fact of inspiration, so clearly affirmed in the New Testament, and so well attested by the character and influence of the sacred writings. On the whole, we think it safer to wait for further information.

—December 14th, 1899, will be the centennial anniversary of the death of George Washington, and it is said that the Masonic fraternity is preparing to make that day an occasion of a great demonstration in his memory and to the praise of that order. Those who are religiously opposed to the Masonic fraternity are making some strong objections to this procedure on the ground that Washington was never the master of a lodge and had not even been in a lodge more than twice for thirty years prior to his death. In objection to that day being monopolized by the Masonic fraternity the Christian Cynosure has published several documents, including a letter from Gen. Washington himself, to show that he was a Mason in his early days, but had ceased to attend the lodge in 1768 and never again took much interest in those matters, and in the light of these documents we do not see that Masons have much ground for boasting in Gen. Washington's Freemasonry.

—Sometime ago the Ministerial Alliance, of Nevada, Mo., published a statement to the world strongly denouncing the doctrines and methods of magnetic healing as taught and practiced in that city. To this there was a counter statement made by a class of men claiming to represent the business interests of Nevada, honoring the founder of the Nevada institute for healing, as a man in whom the public could place the utmost confidence. And now more recently the Ministerial Alliance of Nevada comes out in another statement in which they reaffirm their former convictions of fraud and deception preached and practiced in their city under the name of "magnetic healing," and give additional reasons for their convictions. They believe that the public are being deceived and swindled out of their money by these healers; that they could not succeed as they do by the pure and simple practice of mental suggestion and massage; that they have associated with these simple methods of treatment Spiritualism, Pantheism, Christian Science, superstition and other vagaries. In the light and strength of the facts presented in their recent circular it seems that it would at least be well for any afflicted person applying to these healers in Nevada to communicate with this alliance before entrusting themselves to the hands of these healers for treatment. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has refused to admit the advertisement of the Nevada institute for healing into its columns, notwithstanding the fact that it is a paying cash ad, and thinks that great caution is to be exercised in the use of megnetic healers anywhere. The very claim that the most illiterate persons can be prepared in ten days for the treatment of the worst cases of fevers and organic troubles is too absurd a thing for common sense to entertain for a single moment of time. Better generate your own magnetism and keep your money at home.

—The Osservatore Romano, the organ of the papacy in Rome, defended the silence of the Pope in the Dreyfus trial by saying his Holiness could not be expected to "espouse the cause of a Semite accused of treason;" to which the London Times made the crushing reply: "Who founded the Catholic Church but a Semite accused of treason?"—The Interior.

—We present this week on our first page an excellent map of the Boer Republics in South Africa, reduced from a larger map printed in Harper's Weekly. This region will be the scene of some noted battles within the next few weeks, in all probability, and readers would do well to preserve the map to refer to.

—One of the questions discussed at the Baptist Congress, held in Pittsburg, Pa., Nov. 14-16, was "the resurrection," in which various interpretations of this Bible term were set forth. The weight of the argument, however, seemed to favor the resurrection of the body. Prof. Ten Broeke, of McMaster University, Toronto, thinks that the Scriptures teach that "there is a future existence with some form of physical organism adapted to the needs of that life, and given according to the will of God," and this thought seemed to be that of the congress. One so seldom hears a sermon, address or paper on that subject in these days that it almost sounds strange to our ears. It almost makes one wonder whether the world is going forward or backward. The resurrection was one of the great themes by which the apostles stirred up whole cities, and it is still a fundamental doctrine of the Christian religion; and if more of the great themes of the gospel were more frequently and urgently presented from the pulpits of the land to-day there would be less complaint about empty pews and few conversions.

—The Methodist Episcopal Church held a Congress in this city last week. The Congress met in the Lindell Avenue Church and was largely attended. There were prominent Methodist divines here from many of the states. Each day was given to the discussion of prominent themes bearing upon the the polity and efficiency of the church, while each evening was devoted to a popular lecture to which an admittance was charged. The Congress opened on Monday with a discussion of the effort to raise twenty million dollars for their educational institutions and interests. The afternoon session on Monday was devoted to a discussion of "Order of Public Worship," in which it appears that in Methodism there is a marked trend toward Episcopalianism, in this respect at least. And of course it is no secret that in Episcopalianism there is an equally marked trend toward Roman Catholicism in this same respect. Is it not time, therefore, that one should arise in the Methodist Episcopal Church and raise the momentous question, "Whither are we drifting?"

—Toward the close of the Methodist Congress in this city last week Dr. J. A. Duncan, of Knoxville, Tenn., made an eloquent appeal in his address on "Denominational Catholicity" for Protestant unity. The vital elements of Christianity are held in common by the evangelical churches and for this reason, together with the emergencies of the times, he held ought to bring them into a closer fellowship. Here are his closing words as reported by the press:

What a power such a united Protestantism would be! (he declared.) What at remendous saving of all our forces! What a mighty moral influence such a spectacle would produce upon mankind! What a baptism of the Holy Ghost might we expect, when we all gather together and with one heart and mind pour out our souls for the promise of the Father! If this were done it would not be long before the word catholic would have a new meaning, or rather be restored to its primitive meaning. This consummation, I believe, rests with us.

—Do not fail to read the beautifully told yet pathetic story in our Family Circle this week, from the Alkehest, entitled "Going Home."

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of last week was the very best yet. I rejoice in its every prosperity. It fitly represents a great, growing and aggressive people. Its face is toward the future D. W. MOORE.
Springfield, Mo.

—Some people's idea of the evil of sin is in being caught at it. The police court is daily filled with people who are very sorry for what they did, but would have no compunctions of conscience in doing the like again.—Herald and Presbyter.

—Rabbi Fleischer, a prominent Hebrew of Boston, is said to have created a sensation by his criticisms on the President's Thanksgiving Proclamation. He thinks it too highly imbued with the "me und Gott" spirit, and the steady gain in morals referred to in the proclamation the Rabbi thinks refers to political conditions rather than morals. While we are not disposed to question the President's meaning and sincerity in the statement, we do question whether the morals of the country and especially of the army, were as much improved as they might have been if he, the President, had cooperated more fully with the moral element of the country and with God in the effort to secure the abolishment of the army canteen.

—The government, it seems, has decided to employ no more women hereafter in its departments at Washington. None now employed will be dismissed, but as their time expires they will fail of re-employment. Various reasons are assigned, but an unnamed reason given in a recent St. Louis Christian Advocate editorial, we are inclined to think, assigns the true motive for this radically un-American political movement. Here is the Advocate's reason:

Men have votes, and in most states, women have none. The government employes at Washington number many thousands, and in a close contest, such as several recent presidential elections have been, every vote is valuable, and it has been the rule to allow the employes several days' leave of absence to go home and vote. An increase in the number of men in the government offices at Washington means an augmentation of the resources of the party in power, no matter what that party may be, so the policy cannot be considered a party measure, for any party would doubtless be glad to avail itself of an augmentation of its vote.

—The way that some of our contemporaries are speaking of our Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati shows, clearly, that they are beginning to see the point; to see the real gist of our plea and the element of our success as a religious factor in the world. Here is a recent utterance from the Interior on the subject:

That the convention was the most successful of any religious assemblage of the year is admitted on all sides. It is therefore very well worth while to inquire for the causes. We think the Advocate's reasons are correct, so far as they go; but that back of them is the primary reason, stated by the Standard, that the Disciples stand for the Church of Christ universal, and are therefore receiving the benefit of the powerful current toward Christian union. We do not think they are logically entitled to it, but the people do not bother themselves about the logic. There flies a banner in protest against sectarianism and for primitive apostolic Christianity, and hence the enthusiasm.

—To satisfy an anxious inquiry Cornell University authorities have just calculated "the length of time necessary for a man to take all the courses offered" at the university. A count showed about 518 courses offered annually. A fair average student will complete about five courses in a year. He could therefore complete all the courses of his freshman year in the course of 110 years. But only the elementary courses are the same year after year, while the advanced courses are changed; for example, a course in Browning last year is dropped for a course in Wordsworth this year, and a course in Milton next. Fully half the courses are new each year For every year's study, therefore, the student would find 55 years more needed to catch up with his opportunities. A simple calculation shows that at the end of the 110 years necessary to complete the courses offered when he was a freshman, he would need to study 6,050 years to cover the courses missed in the meantime, and he would then be only at the beginning of his difficulties.

The above item from a Cornell news letter helps one to realize what an education in its unqualified sense may signify. Perspectively this is a discouraging outlook for the young man who wants an education; but happily a man's usefulness is not dependent upon universal knowledge. This is an age of specialties, and hence the special course for practical uses. The university idea is to meet this special want in any chosen field.

—We like the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. If we cannot at all times endorse everything it publishes, we sometimes think the fault is not entirely with the writers, but with our inability to see things as clearly as they see them.
W. B. S.

This preacher and his brethren have made advancement beyond that of many others. They have reached the point, in their intellectual and spiritual growth, when they can conceive of the possibility that they themselves may be mistaken, or may not have as clear a view of the truth as those who differ from them. There are thousands of good people who have never made that much progress, but who invariably set it down that the man who differs from them is to that extent wrong!

—The annual report submitted to the Jubilee Convention in October by the Home Board contained a recommendation for a special evangelistic movement to close the century which must certainly meet the approbation of every Disciple of Christ. It reads as follows:

Believing that the close of the century should witness a great revival of religious life among the American people, and believing that we should be workers together with God in the saving of souls, the board recommends that a movement be inaugurated in this convention pledging a thousand of our churches and preachers to hold a missionary protracted meeting during the year of at least ten days' duration, either under the auspices of the general or state or district board of missions, and that the results of this movement be reported at our next general convention.

A missionary protracted meeting is one held at some weak point away from one's own church, the minister consenting to receive whatever compenstion the brethren at such point may be able to give.

As this movement was unanimously endorsed by the convention all our churches and preachers should take immediate steps toward its execution. And that a proper supervision and record of the movement be had you are requested to notify secretaries B. L. and C. C. Smith, Cincinnati, O., whether church or preacher, that you are willing to hold such a meeting.

I rejoice to know that you have decided to retain your position as editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I have been taking the paper for a number of years, and am one among the many of its readers who have always found it helpful and elevating. I was sickened at the thought of the paper changing hands, I thank the Father that you are still willing and ready to go on with a work that is doing untold good. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is undoubtedly one of the best religious journals published by our people, or any people for that matter. Of course all people can not see and understand alike; that is impossible. Christ even could not please every one when on earth.

PERSONAL MENTION.

Chas. Reign Scoville closed his meeting in Dallas, Texas, with 117 additions.

H. A. Northcutt is nearing the 100 mark in his Marshall meeting; 84 at last accounts.

I. J. Spencer reports 50 additions in 15 days at Winchester, Ky. Work in the Central Church, Lexington, also booming.

W. H. Waggoner reports an excellent institute on missions held at Ballards, Mich. The attendance was most gratifying to him.

John T. Cropper, of Clinton, Mo., has been making a tour of the churches in Kansas and reports them as "doing well and hoping to do better."

E. H. Kellar, of Waxahachie, writes that he "starts to do the world next week." He is to make a tour of the world, of which mention has been previously made in these columns.

We are sorry to learn that Burris A. Jenkins, president University of Indianapolis, is still confined to his bed and unable to furnish usual his contribution to our Endeavor column.

W. S. Priest, writing from Atchison, Kan., says that they now have over 500 members; the largest audiences in the city by far; cannot seat the people; sorely need a house seating 1,000 to 1,500 people.

The Daily Argus, Tonawanda, N. Y., speaks very favorably of A. M. Hootman's sermons and work in North Tonawanda. He seems to have large audiences and is attracting large attention.

Geo. M. Reed, pastor of the church in Valparaiso, Neb., writing under date of Nov. 26, says: "My dear old father fell asleep in Jesus at Bloomington, Ill., Nov. 24, at 6 P. M. Age, 92 years"—almost a centenarian.

The chief address in a union Thanksgiving service held in Nevada, Mo., was delivered by B. F. Hill, of the Church of Christ, in the church of Methodists in that city. His theme was "Our Country's Destiny."

W. D. Lane closes his labors with the church at LeRoy, Bradford Co., Pa., with the last Lord's day in January, 1900. He says: "A good man will find a pleasant field and a good people here among whom to labor." Those interested may address Leroy Holcomb, Church Clerk.

T. W. McDonald, writing from Jefferson, Iowa, says that D. A. Hunter, who has been for some time evangelizing in Oklahoma, has returned home to visit his family and rest. He preached for Bro. McDonald last night to a large and appreciative audience. Bro. Hunter is aiming to work in Iowa for a while.

A. R. Hunt, who served the church at Tarkio, Mo., 16 months, has now become the pastor of the church in Savannah, Mo. While at Tarkio 73 were added to the church and he speaks in the highest praise of the brethren there. His work at Tarkio closed with a successful meeting of three weeks' and 16 additions.

J. V. Coombs' meeting in the Prospect Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo., closed with 141 additions. There were 33 came forward in one day and 29 another. This church had been without a pastor for some time, but this did not prevent the success of the meeting. Bro. Coombs begins a meeting in Pittsfield, Ill., January 1st.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the Church of Christ in Lexington, Mo., through a committee specially appointed have unanimously endorsed resolutions on the death of Meta May Hosfeldt, one of their prominent workers, testifying to her Christian life and faithful work in the Master's service, and also expressing their sympathy to those who so deeply feel and mourn her loss.

J. G. M. Luttenberger and his wife returned to their home in Dorchester, Ill., on last Friday. Sister Luttenberger, who underwent a critical surgical operation at the Mayfield Sanitrium, feels that she has now fully regained her health and is greatly rejoiced over it. Brother Luttenburger and J. W. Zachary, of Lexington, Ky., are to hold a protracted meeting at Gillespie, Ill., beginning December the 6th.

Elder Albert Haws, of Oakland, California, has written a tract, or rather, perhaps, a small book, on "Sabbatarian Theories and Delusions." While he clearly refutes the doctrines of Sabbatarians we are not prepared to concur in his interpretation of the creative days in Genesis. Evidently, however, Bro. Haws has spent considerable time in the preparation of this work, which ought to be of great use to any who have any doubts on the question of the day to be observed as a day of worship. Price of the book, 25 cents.

Christmas Concert Services

We have a great variety of Services for Christmas, among which are the following:

1. The Wonderful Child. By W. W. Dowling. One of the best ever issued. Consisting of Bible Readings, Recitations, Class Exercises and Songs, with music in full.

2. The Unspeakable Gift. By F. S. Shepard. With music in full.

3. The Old, Old Story. By L. E. Jones and F. S. Shepard. Readings, Recitations and Songs, with music in full.

4. The Sweet Old Story. By W. W. Dowling. A Service in Scripture Story, Poetry and Song without music, introducing in costume Angels, Shepherds, King Herod, and the Magi, with parts for many special speakers.

5. Tidings of Joy. By J. L. B. and L. E. Jones. New music and well-arranged Readings and Recitations.

6. The Guiding Star. By W. W. Dowling. A Service arranged for all classes, composed of Poetical Recitations, Bible Readings, Solos, Quartettes and Choruses, without music, all of which point to Jesus as King of Israel.

7. The Story of Jesus. By W. W. Dowling. A Service in Poetry, Scripture and Song, without music. It begins with the expulsion from Eden, and noting the prophecies of Christ's coming, his advent, scenes in his life, his betrayal, his crucifixion, his resurrection and ascension, closes with his coronation as King of kings.

STYLES AND PRICES

The above services each contain 16 pages, neatly printed, stitched and trimmed. The price of those which have the music printed in full is 5 cents per copy; 50 cents per dozen; $3.00 per hundred. The price of those which have the words of the songs without the music is 25 cents per dozen; $2.00 per hundred.

☞No free sample copies, but a sample of each of the above will be sent for 25 cents.

YOUNG SANTA CLAUS. A complete Christmas Cantata by J. H. Rosecrans and Annie D. Bradley. Young Santa Claus is undoubtedly one of the best productions of these two popular authors. The characters are Mother and Children, Guests, Santa Claus, Jr., Beggar Girl and Patrick. It is so arranged that any number of children can take part in the Service, and the various scenes admit of much decoration. The exercises close with a Christmas Tree and the distribution of presents. Price, 25 cents per copy; $2.40 per dozen.

Christian Publishing Company, 1522 Locust Street, St. Louis, Mo.

Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind., dedicated the new and beautiful house of worship for the Bellevue congregation, Pittsburg, Pa, on the 19th of November. The house and lot cost $16,000. All the churches of Allegheny County were represented. The house is 130x138, amphitheatre design and seats 350; with the Sunday-school, room 600. It is a modern building and elegantly finished and furnished. J. H. Craig is the present pastor of the church.

Bro. F. W. Troy, 1295 Rogers Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y., desires to come West and engage in either evangelistic or pastoral work. Bro. Troy has for a number of years been engaged in work for the church in Brooklyn, and he refers to such brethren as J. J. Haley, Cynthiana, Ky.; W. Durban, of London; W. T. Moore, Columbia; B. B. Tyler, Colorado Springs. Those wishing to correspond with Bro. Troy may address him as above.

On Sunday, Nov. 19, 1899, Bro. N. M. Ragland entered upon the 15th year of his work as pastor of the First Christian Church, Fayetteville, Ark. His sermon upon this occasion was printed in full in one of the papers of that city, and is beautiful for its spirit, its faith, its portrayal of divine love, its delicate references to his own work, its interwoven poems and its rhetoric. But for its length we should be glad to give it to our readers as it came to us.

G. F. Assiter recently tendered his resignation as pastor of the church in New Franklin, Mo. The church, however, passed a resolution declining to accept the resignation, but Bro. Assiter will, we understand, adhere to his determination to change his field of service, notwithstanding the hearty resolution of confidence which was passed without a dissenting vote. He is, therefore, open to engagement by any church in need of an active, strong preacher.

S. W. Leffingwell, of Hemet, Cal., writes that he has found the ideal place to live. Since there he has regained his health although in constant work. He says they now have a good a church at San Jacinto, three miles from Hemet, a good house paid for and are now looking for a consecrated preacher. Bro. Leffingwell was a Sunday-school evangelist in Illinois a few years ago, and it was while engaged in that work that his health failed. He now has a comfortable home amidst beautiful surroundings and would gladly answer any questions of persons wanting to locate on the Pacific Coast.

The Christian Church in Toledo, Ill., is building a new house of worship, and the Junior Endeavor Society of that church have undertaken to raise money for the purchase of a bell, and to do this they are making an album quilt, the center block of which is to have a picture of the church and the remaining blocks each a picture of the bell. The Juniors are asking names at 10 cents each for the accomplishment of their work, and we write this notice of it for their encouragement. We are glad to see children enlisted in the good work of church building. E. E. Hartley is the pastor the church in Toledo, and his wife is assisting the Juniors in their work.

D. N. Wetzel, formerly of Eureka, Ill., is now pastor of the church in Richland Center, Wis. His labors there began Nov. 19, with one confession. He is pleased with the outlook and praises the brethren for their earnestness in the work. Under the leadership of the state missionary, C. G. McNeill, they have remodeled their old building and built to it a large and convenient addition, which we will dedicate next month. They are planning for and expecting great things.

In our obituary column, this week, will be found a tribute to one of our old veterans of the cross, Elder J. W. Kellar, who at the age of fourscore years, passed to his reward, Sept. 5, 1899. The memorial was written by R. M. Neale and appeared in another paper the name of which the party enclosing the clipping forgot to mention. Owing to Bro. Kellar's wide acquaintance among the churches in Illinois, Missouri and Kansas, we reprint the tribute as it was sent to us. We also extend our sympathy to Sister Kellar in her loneliness of life.

Old People's Home.

The Christian Old People's Home has at last been opened at 901 Aubert Avenue, St. Louis. We have started this home with very little of anything except faith in the Lord and our people and we believe we will not be disappointed.

We have a little money, but a part of this must be used to put the house in repairs—plumbing, papering and whitening being necessary.

We still lack a great many things to make the home comfortable for the old people. Our greatest need, of course, is money with which to buy coal, provisions, etc., but if you have anything in the way of furniture, carpets or cooking utensils which we can use, please send them. We also need small heating stoves, dishes, dressers, washstands and curtains.

This is the Lord's work, and the only way we can accomplish it is through his people.

MRS. G. A. HANDLEY,
Chairman House Committee.

Correspondence.

New York Letter.

Professor Walter A. Wycoff, whose sociological knowledge of the working classes was gained by becoming a tramp and going through all the experiences and hardships incident to such a life, spoke on his favorite topic, "Tramping with Tramps," at one of the Young Men's Christian Associations a few days since. In his speech he said one of the things that impressed him was the ease with which he obtained employment as a farm laborer, hotel porter, or railroad "navvy," in any part of the country. He said whenever he wanted employment he could find it without difficuly. This, however, applies to country districts only. In the large cities he found this very different. In Chicago, for instance, he had to contend against an army of 30,000 or 40,000 unemployed laboring men. This condition, he said, demands centralization of labor on the one hand and of capital on the other. Another thing that impressed him deeply was the attitude of workmen toward religion. These are his words:

I have attended many of the anarchist and socialist meetings in Chicago, and was much impressed by the range of knowledge displayed by many of these men. They would sneer at the preachers, but Jesus Christ was their ideal The preachers they called the parasites of society. They would receive the name of the Savior with veneration, because they regarded him as the ideal of the solidarity of the human race and the brotherhood of man. It was a great surprise to me when I learned of this attitude of the workingmen toward religion and their reverence for Jesus Christ. I thank God that I am living in a period when life in all its volume is being realized; when we recognize the responsibilities by which you and I are bound together, and Jesus Christ stands before man as the representative of that idea. It is no sham battle that we are fighting in the life before us, but we shall conquer only as we abide in the strength of Jesus Christ, who is the realization that One is our Father, even God, and all men are brothers

No doubt many will recall Mr. Wycoff's very interesting articles on his experiences entitled, "The Workers," in recent issues of Scribner's Magazine.

On Sunday, Nov. 26, the twenty-seventh anniversary of the McAuley Mission was celebrated at 316 Water St., this city. One day a a missionary by the name of Little was confronted by a drunken woman on a pair of rickety old stairs down on the east side of New York, who wanted to fight. "Do you know Jesus?" asked the missionary by way of diverting the issue. The drunken wretch asked, "Jesus, who is he?" Near by on the floor was a bundle of rags in which was a human being. These rags, rising to their feet, demanded: "What's that yez says?" It was the voice of Jerry McAuley, drunkard, thug, thief, exconvict, who had been out of Sing Sing but a short time. He had been sentenced to nineteen years, but was pardoned before the end of the term. McAuley had "experienced conversion" behind the walls of Sing Sing prison, but did not persevere. Poor fellow, after backsliding five times he finally reached firm footing and continued faithful. His modest efforts to do good enlisted the sympathy and help of a few moneyed men, with whose assistance he soon transformed 316 Water St. from one of the lowest dance houses into a Christian mission with Jerry McAuley in charge. It is noted for a fact that it is the first "rescue work" known in this country, and also for its wonderful history. It has been the scene of many thrilling incidents and the starting-point of thousands of renewed lives.

John Jægar, a drunken Dutch anarchist, who stumbled into McAuley's Mission one night, was made a believer, and afterwards opened a mission called the "Mission of Living Waters," at 136 Christie St. The old anarchist and his mission are still there doing good work. John H. Wyburn, a young man who had seen better days, came into the place to beat the superintendent out of ten dollars, and got salvation instead; and now he superintends the Bowery Mission, one of the most successful slum missions in New York City. The superintendent of the old Brewery Mission, of Montreal, Col., H. H. Hadley, head of the (Episcopal) Church Army and founder of the Christian Total Abstinence Union; John Wood, the founder of missions in the United States Navy; Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, the woman who first opened the "Door of Hope" in New York City, and afterwards established similar missions in many other cities; Samuel H. Hadley, the present superintendent of the McAuley Mission; A. H. Rice, of the Elizabeth (N. J.) Mission; T. H. Cortwell, of the Covington (Ky) Rescue Mission, and many others that might be mentioned, were either converts of the McAuley Mission or inspired by its work to undertake the same kind of service in other places. Its a great record of rescuing the perishing and is full of inspiration to those whose lives are given to lift up the fallen.

The Greenpoint or Second Church, Brooklyn, continues to prosper under the leadership of Bro. John L. Keevil. Four persons made the good confession there at a recent service; others are "almost persuaded." This little church is very much encouraged and is hopeful. Bro. Denham is much encouraged at 56th St., and Bro. Harlan starts off well at Sterling Place, Brooklyn. We are glad these new men in our great city have taken hold of the work with enthusiastic determination. The Disciples at Newark and vicinity have appointed a committee who are looking for a suitable place in which to start a Sunday-school and prayer meeting service, in the hope of developing into a church soon. Again, let me ask, if any one reading this may happen to know of any Disciples of Christ living in Newark or vicinity that he inform Bro. E. L. Kellond, 24 North 7th St., Newark, N. J., of their names and addresses, and such persons will be looked after. Bro. E. M. Flinn has resigned at Haverhill, Mass., to take effect Jan. 1, 1900. Bro. Flinn has done faithful service at Haverhill. He is well educated and delights to work for Christ. He prefers to locate in the East. Now is the chance for a good field to secure a growing young man. We should keep him in our section of the country if possible.

The Silver Jubilee League of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society — "What is that?" did you ask? It is a monument in the right direction. Its object is to help toward the raising of $200,000 for Foreign Missions in this the Silver Jubilee Year of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Membership in this league is $25, or $1 for each year of the society's glorious history. The amount is to be paid on or before Sept. 1, 1900. It may be paid in whole or installments; it may be credited on a life membership or life directorship in the Foreign Society, and every one becoming a member will receive the Missionary Intelligencer five years free of charge. It is to be hoped that hundreds of men and women will gladly take membership in this "Silver Jubilee League" for the salvation of dying, ho eless men.

A Sad Story, but a Happy Ending.

"During the winter of 1897 I had a very severe attack of La Grippe," writes Mr. D. P. Hall of Berry Ferry, Ky.," which came very near winding up my earthly career. It left me with rheumatism, catarrh of the head and throat, kidney disease, indigestion, in fact I was a physical wreck. I began taking Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer. I took it regularly for six months, and the result was I got rid of the rheumatism and all of my other troubles. I am in better health to-day than I have been for years."

"I am the mother of four children," writes Mrs. Euphemia Falconer, of Trent, Muskegon Co., Mich. "My first two babies were still-born, and I suffered every thing but death. My friends all thought I could never recover. I was reduced to 109 pounds. When I was three months along for my third child I was taken with hemorrhage or flooding and came near having a miscarriage from female weakness. For two months I was under the care of our doctor, but was getting weaker all the time until one day I happened to come across one of your little books and I read it through, and the next day I sent and got three bottles of 'Favorite Prescription' and one bottle of 'Pellets.' I improved so fast I continued to take your medicine until baby was born, and he is healthy and all right. My health has been good ever since. I now weigh 165 pounds."

"Favorite Prescription" makes Weak Women Strong, and Sick Women Well.

Signs of the Times.

Our Baptist brethren may as well accept it as a finality—close communion must go. Spurgeon's people and other English Baptists have so decided long ago; the Baptists of New York and Chicago and many other places have passed it by as a doctrine that is not to be accepted now; and a large majority of the Southern Baptists will tell any one in private conversation to-day that they don't like this feature of their church polity.

One other thing is even more evident: The Methodist Church must and will give up infant baptism. A large majority of this people to-day are ignoring this doctrine and refuse to practice it. When I said to a Methodist brother lately, You will have to quit it, he said: "No, we won't, we have already quit it. I don't know when I saw or heard of an infant being baptized in our church." Then I said, I do like your candor, and now let me suggest that you just pass it back to Mother Rome and have her take and keep her own. This is also true to a great extent in the Presbyterian Church. Having heard an Episcopal minister announce his intention to "christen" some babies I said in the hearing of a Presbyterian lady, "I must go, I want to see where he gets the Scripture for such procedure," and she said: "If you find out let me know, for I have never believed in it enough to practice it." With these two dogmas out of the way, what a stride will have been taken toward centralizing our Protestantism.

I would feel like drawing much closer to Baptists and Methodists when each has ridded itself of its most obnoxous doctrine.

If the supply is effected by the demand surely the conditions in our new territory suggests that we Protestants get as close together as we can, and unite and strengthen our forces for the conflict in Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines.

Christian Endeavor in Porto Rico.

DEAR CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS IN THE HOMELAND:—It is with hearts full of gratitude to our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ for his goodness and mercy in opening the doors of this dark island to the light of his blessed gospel that we, the Christian Endeavors of San Juan, dare assemble to praise his name and stretch the hand of greeting and fellowship across the waves to you.

Mr. J. A. Erwin and his wife came and established a Christian Church and Endeavor here. The church in these two short months has now 23 members and our Endeavor Society has over 40 members. This is very encouraging in face of all the difficulties that confront us.

Almost all our members are soldiers of Uncle Sam, and better than even that, they also belong to our Master. It would do your hearts good to see and hear how they enjoy the meetings and with what hearty good will our committees labor in the cause of Christ. It is a comical sight, and yet a pathetic one, to see the benches filled with our boys in blue while here and there are ragged little natives who cannot understand a word, yet they come because they enjoy the singing. In the passages and everywhere that there is standing room the space is occupied by Puerto Ricans and Spaniards, waiting until our Endeavor is over before they crowd in to hear the gospel in Spanish, for we hold two services, one in English the other in the native tongue of the island.

Besides having the Word of life preached to them we have two schools: the first is a morning school at which a small tuition is charged; the second, an afternoon school, is for the children of the poor. Both are well attended. One realizes as he travels over this island that its future hope lies in the schools, for only about one out of every ten can read or write. With such dense ignorance on every hand it is only natural that the people should be ignorant and superstitious.

Friends, we want you to help us. We want to establish a reading room in connection with the church for the benefit of English-speaking and reading people. There are over one thousand soldiers alone. They have no place to go except to the saloons. On every side, in almost all the stores, liquors are sold. There are one hundred and six places of infamy, and against such a vast host of dives, etc., there is one little reading room and four Protestant places of worship. What are our boys to do? Friends, this is a serious matter. Many of our soldiers have been stabbed in these low resorts and some mother's boy has gone to meet his Maker unprepared. Will you not help to send some good literature that will be instructive as well as entertaining? Our idea is to have a room fixed up, cozy and homelike, a place where these heartsick boys can come and feel welcome, a place where they can write home and where by little kind deeds they may be drawn nearer our Master.

You in the homeland have no idea of the feeling of loneliness and almost despair that seizes an American here. We are foreigners in our own land. As we walk these narrow streets and hear the continual jabber of a strange tongue, without a real American spot to go to, is it a wonder that our boys take to drinking two-centarvo rum and end either in the guardhouse, hospital or morgue? Many a boy have I heard say with bitterness: "I was a good Christian until I came here; I never drank nor gambled until I came here; I found all doors closed against me except the saloon; what was I to do?"

Dear ones, remember Him who died for us, who gave his very life for us, who said, "Cast thy bread upon the waters." Ask him what he would have you do in this matter, and then do it.

Mr. and Mrs. Erwin keep an open house for all gentlemen and ladies, but there is such a vast number here that it is next to impossible to help them all. With a reading room this would be different.

Mr. Erwin says that he thinks you had better pay the expressage upon books, etc., to New York, or send by mail. Address them to J. A. Erwin, San Juan, Puerto Rico, care of New York and Puerto Rican Steamship Company.

God be with you and bless you, and may we all endeavor to follow in his footsteps day by day, as we strive to be like him. Yours in His name,

CECIL E. STEVENS,
Cor. Sec. Christian Endeavor.

The Perfection of the Christian Endeavor Society.

A recognized fault of our Christian Endeavor work hitherto has been its failure to enlist the intellectual faculties of the young people in behalf of the things to which it invites and urges their spiritual powers. The admirable organization of the Y. P. S. C. E. furnishes an effective machine for doing Christian work. Its strict pledge to public and private devotion provides for the spiritual power to run the machine for Christ. But it is well known that a perfect engine, running under a heavy presure of steam, will inevitably tear itself to pieces, and wreck the machinery of the factory it is intended to propel, if it has not a "governor." What wonder, then, that many Christian Endeavor Societies have failed to run smoothly, continuously, safely, despite good machinery and abundant power, when lacking that mental "governor" which makes zeal according to knowledge.

The Bethany Reading Courses are supplying that "governor" wherever introduced. By rendering the young people intelligent concerning the Bible, missions and the great religious movement with which they are identified, these courses are making intelligent Christians, who will ever be able to give a reason for the faith that is in them. Such Christians will not lose interest in their work and respect for their religion because finding nothing in Christianity to satisfy the demands of the mind.

From the beginning the Disciples have pleaded for a faith able to account for itself and a zeal according to knowledge. Here, then, is an opportunity for our preachers to stand fast by their principles and save their young people from that vapid sentimentality which passes for spiritual fervor and Christian charity in certain Christian Endeavor circles were they move. The Reading Courses will be taken up in few places where the ministers do not introduce them and enlist the young people in their behalf. It is the imperative duty of every pastor to inform himself concerning this work, and then to exert himself to the utmost to introduce the courses among his young people. No one can do his duty by his Christian Endeavor Society who does not attempt this, unless he can prove he already has a better provision for the needs of the members.

Shall the Bible College be Endowed?

The university, with its endowments, equipments, etc., is estimated at $6,000,000. This is as fully at our disposal, for all academic purposes, as if we owned it in our own right, had contributed every dollar, of the six millions, out of our own funds, and controlled it by our own board of trustees. What else, then, do we want? Nothing but a Bible college, where the students of the university can be taught the Word of God.

The time is past when we can compete with such a university with a half-endowed, half-equipped, half-manned college. Can we raise $6,000,000 for a university of our own? To ask such a question is to answer it. But even if this sum could be raised, there are reasons why I would prefer to have the Bible college as we now have it, associated with our State University.

(1) If there is any trouble in the university, any money to find, or discipline to enforce, that is none of our business, and we need not give ourselves much concern about it.

(2) If there is any good to be derived from the university we have the amplest opportunity to share in it, as we have every privilege granted unto us that we could possibly ask.

(3) If the university was our own it would be patronized mainly by our own people, and consequently our sphere of influence would be circumscribed by denominational lines. At present we have in the university all the denominations represented, and a large number of students belonging to no church whatever. Surely, the man must be blind who does not see these advantages.

Will the brethren in the state complete the endowment of the Bible college, or will they hesitate and wait until the crucial apportunity is passed? Now is the time to act.

All we need is $100,000. We have already $30 000 in notes, bearing 6 per cent. interest, and a piece of land that may realize us a few thousand dollars more. But these notes are valid only on two conditions: first, that $50,000 in bona fide pledges shall be secured, and second, that these pledges shall be secured by the 1st of January, 1901. This plan secures the donors against the danger of a collapse after their money has been used, as has been the case in so many instances in our past history.

Will our brethren respond to this earnest appeal? I have been appointed by the board to finish raising at lest the $50,000, and if possible bring the sum up to $100,000. We must have at least three professors to do the work that needs to be done here. If the brethren will give us $100,000 we can do just as much with it as we could with $6,000,000 where we are responsible for all the departments of the university. Brethren, write me at once what you think about this matter.

Eureka College.

In retiring from the field secretaryship of Eureka College I may be permitted a few suggestions to our good brethren of Illinois. During the past year I have been well over the state. The greatness of our power and ability is manifested everywhere. The need of more of our enterprise, teaching and reformatory spirit is seen everywhere. The churches and individuals almost unanimously appreciate the great work of Christian education, and look upon Eureka College as a successful attempt to furnish the young people, filled with noblest purpose and ambition, a rare opportunity to secure a thorough education and at the same time preserve and develop the highest culture and noblest manhood. It seems to me that Eureka College never had more friends than it now has. Nor was there ever manifest more reasons for this genuine friendship. The great army of young people educated under her Christian influence are taking prominent places in all honorable vocations in nearly every community in our state and many far beyond our borders. The integrity and spiritual influence of both her men and women speak her praise louder than any words I could speak. Her ministers rapidly filling leading pulpits, pushing out in the great mission fields of our country and going to the islands of the sea, need no words of commendation from me nor introduction to the thousands of readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. To have a hand in producing such men and women is an honor and pleasure in which any Christian should delight to share. But do we appreciate the fact that such an institution needs more than sentiment and good will? Many responded with commendable liberality to my solicitations for the college and treated me personally with the utmost courtesy and friendship. To these I give my most gracious thanks and trust that the claims of the college may always have a warm place in their hearts and helpful ability. But, brethren, the time has come when we ought to do larger things for our college, when more people should lend a hand, when a more enthusiastic spirit in behalf of the college should everywhere be manifested.

We do not appreciate as we should the difference between Christian and secular education. The one is the formation of intelligent character, the other the training of the mind. The one the training of the intellect, sensibilities and the will, the other training intellect only. The one to produce both a man and a scholar, the other a scholar only. We believe that spiritual integrity and worthy character mean as much in the success and usefulness of our young people and far more than mere mental training. The greatest of all teachers is worthy to still lead the world's education in the development of the entire man. In one at least of our state institutions, a large room is furnished for balls. Think you our young girls who attend them and submit to promiscuous hugging from eight o'clock to two or three o'clock in the morning are likely to develop a high grade of spirituality or the noblest womanhood? Nor is it really any more conducive to manhood than it is to womanhood. Think you that the young men and young women of our normal schools who spend their Lord's days at the card table are fitting themselves for high grade work in our public schools or to become worthy leaders in the morals of our young people? State institutions may fill a valuable place in our educational systems—this is not now called in question—but the best work must be done under better environments than they usually afford. It seems to me then a duty from which we cannot be excused to keep Eureka College well equipped and up to date in all its appointments for the sake, not only of our aggressive Christian influence, but for the sake of our children who aspire to be something worthy an advanced civilization, true refinement and culture.

What is done ought to be done now. It is hard for those living at a distance to appreciate the great burden carried by some of the officers and teachers at Eureka. The college needs help now. You may say this is an old cry. So it is, but none the less pressing and true. Somebody has always been ready to help some, or we would had no college long ago. It is a blessed thing to help support such a work. It is an investment in the highest possible business—the King's business—calling and equipping laborers for him. This is a great opportunity for us, which if neglected may not be so great ten years from now. Great advances are being made in educational affairs. We must keep up our part. Every Christian should feel a responsibility in this work surpassed by no claim among us. We ought to do now what we expect to do, for to-morrow is not ours. Last winter I visited two old people interested in Eureka College. Of their competency they expected to leave a considerable share to Eureka College and would fix it up soon. The father died a little later, the wife never recovered from the shock of her husband's death, and soon followed him to the cemetery. The considerable estate which the good father allowed his children together is being scattered to the four winds. How much their offering might have been and what a tribute to their memory and a power for good through the ages! But it is all lost for want of prompt action.

Pres. Hardin is devoting about all his time to the financial interests of the college. Receive him as a brother in the Lord, for his cause is most worthy. Do all in your power to help this great work. J. G. WAGGONER.

THE correct construction of a costume according to one's own ideas can best be accomplished at home by one's self. The most convenient stitching mechanism for the purpose is the Singer Automatic, making the single-thread chain-stitch. Its simplicity of parts, easy operation, and the excellence of its work, specially commend its use to the dilettante dressmaker desiring to express her artistic perceptions in the most appropriate form.

Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing-machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

Add-Ran Letter.

Texas is a great state, stretching over seven hundred miles in each direction of the cardinal points, reaching as high as heaven in its best aspirations, and alas, too often as deep as hades in its worst attainments.

It is located in the South and West, and partakes of the conflicting characteristics of both. Its older citizens retain the chivalry of the South and its more recent population the restlessness and self seeking enterprise of the West. The Southern element has for its earthly goddess woman—the ideal woman whose embodiment is the mother, the daughter, the sister and the wife and whose injury or insult is the highest crime. The Western element has for its deity the goddess of liberty on the silver dollar and its theology is too often "In God we trust"—provided we can trust him a dollar's worth each time. To these also the highest crime is any injury or insult offered their goddess.

It has been my privilege here to come into closer relationship with two giants, and they have helped me to read life's riddle. They are John Logan, incidentally state evangelist, but primarily scholar, metaphysician, theologian, artist; and the second is like unto him, Addison Clark, incidentally president for a quarter of a century, but primarily a man.

Add-Ran is at the front. Two-thirds of the debt has been paid this summer, the building improved, the faculty increased. We have as large and as strong a faculty as that of any institution in our brotherhood, numbering about twenty in actual residence, besides nonresident lecturers. We have not a single undergraduate tutor. Most of the teachers have taken postgraduate studies—two at Harvard, two in Boston. All with one or two exceptions have their second collegiate degree, and eight the doctorate.

Our class of ministerial students is of unusual worth, and we are looking forward with anticipation to their labors in the vineyard.

The university has been holding a protracted meeting for the students. It is their official work. The chapel hour is occupied, and John Logan does the preaching. And it is preaching. I long to share him with every university among us. He is thoughtful, quiet, manly, with no overwrought pathos. His work is telling on their thoughtful manhood and womanhood. Over a dozen came forward at one time, and many confessions and baptisms have gladdened our hearts from time to time.

I hope to continue this lesson in Texas geography and ethnology in another letter before long. ALBERT BUXTON, Chancellor.

The Christian Orphan School.

ITS CHARTERED PURPOSE, OBLIGATION AND RIGHTS.

ARTICLE IV.—It is the purpose of this Association to establish a boarding school for the education and graduation of orphan girls and other girls who are in dependent circumtances, in the various branches of intellectual, moral, religious and economic attainments, and the granting of diplomas to its graduates, and as incidental hereto the acquision of real and personal property by gift, purchase, devise or bequest, the construction of suitable buildings, the etsablishment of libraries, art and natural museums and the establishment of a permanent endowment fund, or funds for the support of such school and adjuncts, and until the funds of this association are sufficient to maintain such school, filled with such girls, its Board of Directors may by such by-laws as may be approved by the Missouri Christian Convention as hereinafter described, or by its missionary board in the interval between the meetings of said Convention, provide for the admission of other pupils as pay boarders, or day pupils, provided that said Convention or its Missionary Board shall have the right to determine the time when the authority to take pay pupils shall cease, and provided that none, either as beneficiary pay pupils, but white girls shall be admitted to said school.

It is very evident from the above article of our charater that the founders of the Orphan School of the Christian Church of Missouri had before their generous hearts and clear heads a distinct conception of the school which they proposed to found. They had no prophetic power. They did not make provision for every change that might come up in the growth of our people. This does not detract from their ability. It is common for a nation or a state to outgrow its laws. It might therefore have been expected that the projectors of this enterprise would in some measure fail to grasp the future conditions under which the school could reach its maximum of usefulness.

In one respect they provided for all time. The chief object of the school should forever remain the education of the orphan and dependent girls. The institution should stand as an exponent of pure and undefiled religion. It should proclaim to the world the beauty of cooperation in securing the greatest good to the greatest number of dependent girls. It should become a fountain of power flowing from the generosity of the Disciples of Missouri toward the evangelization of the world. It should, as far as possible, be world-wide in its aim. Young women who are here educated should be filled with the spirit of Christ which is the spirit of missions. But it is very evident that such results cannot be had without an adequate endowment, or a sufficient income from some source.

The founders of the school felt that the endowment would not, at first, be large enough to realize their purposes. Hence there was a provision made with a time limit to be determined either by the convention, or its agent, the Missionary Board, during which, the school should have authority to receive and educate pay pupils, either as boardors or as day pupils. The emergency which created this provision to supplement the inadequate benevolent income still exists. It is doubtful if that need will ever disappear. Experience has shown that it takes not less than fifteen thousand dollars to keep up a full curriculum, aid about forty girls and meet current expenses. Even this sum, though economically expended, needs enlargement because the workers in some departments are overworked. An industrial department should be introduced. But, if the school continue to stand side by side with the other schools in the state, furnishing equal advantages in art, music and elocution, nothing short of $15,000 can successfully run the institution. This being the fact, at least $12,000 must be realized from paying pupils, or the institution must have an endowment of $200,000.

Though the school has from the beginning kept its faith by annually educating a large number of poor and dependent girls, the endowment has not met the expectations of its founders. The failure to realize the charter's purpose has not been in the school, but it has been in the expected donors. We need not assign full reasons for this failure, but on the surface there floats a reason all must see. However generous our people may be, there is a money limit to giving. We are not as wealthy as some religious bodies. Too many schemes calling for immediate enlargement and ample endowment fill the people with confusion and a consequent failure creates distrust. Vigorous pumping brings an increased volume of water; but the number of pumps may be so multiplied that the vein of water will be exhausted and muddy streams will flow forth, not to quench thirst, but to produce disease and death.

It is simply certain that before the orphan school had time to be endowed other enterprises diverted the streams of benevolence. Indeed, optimistic friends thought that the school's object was so laudable, its backers so trustworthy and its managers so wise and skillful that fountains of benevolence would burst forth from a thousand sources and the school would soon not be required to take paying pupils. Here was the chief failure. We had to learn that however great and good the purpose of a school, it could not endow itself. No, not even with several able solicitors could the institution secure an endowment of $200,000. Be it said with deep gratitude and to the praise of many generous souls, quite a number of princely offerings have been made. Dr. Woods, of Kansas City, Alexander Breckenridge, D. M. Dulany, Robert Estill, Elizabeth Hess and a number of liberal persons, including Harvey Newsom, of the county of Callaway, made munificent offerings to the school. But with all this munificence, and with annual offerings from a number of county co-operations, from Sunday-schools and from Christian Endeavor Societies, it still stands that there is need of a large paying patronage.

From the first the name orphan has been an impediment in the way of securing paying pupils. To this $5,000 indebtedness is traceable. It embarrasses paying pupils to be asked why they attend such school, for they are not beneficiaries, but really benefactors, since they create the income to meet current expenses. To secure fifty paying boarding pupils, it becomes necessary to canvass Missouri, Oklahoma, Indian Territory and part of Kansas. The possible paying pupils must be double or treble the number of actual, paying pupils enrolled. The name of the school makes the work of the canvasser three times as hard. It is an obstruction which must in some way be surmounted.

Since the name is not necessary to the existence of the school, but a hindrance; since it imposes a hardship upon its management, entailing ceaseless toil and great pecuniary sacrifice, the local board recommended that the name be changed. The Convention at Jefferson City by on overwhelming majority pessed a resolution authorizing such change to be made.

A special statute of the commonwealth authorizes a change in the name of any corporation provided such change works no ill to the object for which the corporation was founded. It has been seen that the primary purpose of the school was the education of orphan and dependent girls. It therefore follows that, if the change of name will not only defeat or mar the object for which the school exists, but contribute toward its primary purpose, such change is reasonable, just and necessary.

Nor can it be alleged that the ability to compete with other schools by such change in name forfeits the support of the Disciples of the state, since such competition has existed from the beginning and was made possible by the terms of the charter. Competition has always existed and will continue as long as any two schools offer to patrons equal advantages. If this institution should perish to-morrow there would still remain state schools and private schools conducted by other churches to which many of the girls from the homes of the Disciples are drawn by reduced rates or supposed superior advantages.

The name must be changed or the school richly endowed. In no other way can the emergency be met or the school attain its maximum usefulness. Thirty thousand dollars indebtedness confronts us. It matters not how it was created. It is here. We cannot change the past. The living, plastic present is before us. The school is paying its way and is prosperous. It is doing God's work. It is accomplishing its chartered object. But a debt hangs about its neck like a millstone. Who will take it away? Some generous friends are ready to do it provided our creditors will meet them half way. Suppose some rich friend will pay the debt: would it not be a fit recognition of his generosity for the school to take his name, or take some other name that the directors may adopt? Who will object? Can any man with all the facts before him say no? If any one objects, let him pay off the debt and set us free. The hour has come when the school should remove the objectionable name. This will work ill to no one, but good to all. It will in no way impair the purpose of the school, but rather enable it to enlarge its mission and extend its usefulness to more orphan and dependent girls. Rejoicing as we do that at least fort/ girls have annually for the past three years been helped by the school, we are eager that others may share the advantages here afforded.

The Christian Quarterly.

W. T. Moore has been editor and G. A. Hoffmann publisher of the Christian Quarterly for the last three years. Neither editor nor publisher have received one cent compensation for their labors. It has been a purely missionary work on their part. The readers of the Quarterly owe Dr. Moore a debt of gratitude for the excellent work he has so cheerfully donated. But like others whose lives and work are valuable in the cause of Christ, Dr. Moore is a busy man, and the Christian Quarterly has been drawing heavily on his time and strength. In addition to giving his labor the publisher is out $800 in three years. However important it may be to publish a Quarterly, this is more than one man's share. Hence, unless other arrangements are made the present editor and publisher will discontinue the publication of the Christian Quarterly for the present. However much this is regretted, it seems necessary.

All who wish back numbers can secure them for twenty-five cents, seventy-five cents for a year and two dollars for the three years, if sent at once. Those indebted on subscription will please remit without delay to G. A. Hoffmann, Columbia, Mo. G. A. HOFFMANN.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Orchid is one of the rural schools that seeks the better methods and hearty co-operation constantly. J. Q. Frederick is superintendent, J. T. Craig is minister. The school met its apportionment and gave me a good offering in addition, as they have ever done.

At Union Star a warm welcome was given me and a fine hearing, while so many expressed their pleasure and the heartiest endorsement of the work done, also co-operating with us in more than meeting their apportionment. My Davis namesake is doing them fine work.

Our Missouri schools are doing away with the old haphazzard style of electing their superintendents and are appointing committees of good judgment and experience. The schools ratify the nominations. Let all do so this year and ever after.

T. A. Hedges is holding institutes and met with fine results at Lancaster, with seven additions to the church, also a general enthusiasm in Bible-school work awakened.

The Foreign Society means to keep its silver anniversary with a birthday offering of $25 each from nundreds of the brethren—a dollar for each year of its life. In view of its great work and our own prosperity, many should do this.

John Giddens is at work among the "Uncles" in his district, hoping to report the means raised for a new meeting house at Filley and Cedar. Those knowing him believe it will be done if he undertakes it.

King City, with T. J. Hasty and J. T. Craig are all right, but the weather clerk was against me there. J. T. Craig will change his work at the end of the year, giving some congregation a good opportunity. T. J. Hasty kindly handed me the school opportionment; thanks to him and the school.

This weather is so fine that all the schools deciding to continue until Christmas are now glad of it, and the better decision is to go right along permanently. Why not?

Bro. Gillidett will see that the Harrison County evangelist sees to their Bible-school and their betterment.

Albany is doing well under the pastorate of Pres. Zuinglius Moore, who is also giving much of his time to Central Christian College, while Mrs. Moore does pastoral work in the church, thus helping indeed. What burdens the teachers in our educational institutions carry but few realize and less seem to care. God will bless them in it, but it ought not to be, and rather than have solicitors raising funds they should be filling the schools with students. The faculty at Albany is no exception, but is patiently sacrificing and laboring, hoping for a better day; and I pray it may speedily come, lest they give out by the way.

T. A. Hedges has just closed one of his reviving institutes at Bible Grove, having also two additions to the church.

Elmer Shepard is now pushing his work in the Southeast district, and good reports are coming in from his first effort, but even these will become better farther on.

Did your school help Boys' and Girls' Rally for America last Sunday? Well, if anything was in the way, just keep it next Sunday and you will be the better for it.

Do not plan otherwise than to very promptly meet your school's apportionment to state Bible-school work. Our field forces require $300 a month, and all are so circumstanced that they need it promptly, while we depend on the schools for it. If you defer the payment, as some do, it is not difficult to see the result. We have never paid interest; please do not force us to do so this year. Let every dollar go to the work, none to interest.

Not one of our board has ever charged us with expenses in attending its meetings. Think what that means in years of service for you as in the case of John B. Corwine. Will you not be as good to the work by seeing to the prompt remittance of amount due?

Mexico and Columbia gave us great help in meeting the fieldmen's salaries, and will not other schools immediately do likewise?

State Mission Notes.

I want you to read with me the following two letters; they are from men whose names are well known in the state and have done my heart good, and they are published with the hope they will lead some others in the state to see the need of having the same feeling of consecration to this great work. The first is from Brother W. F. Turner, Joplin:

"DEAR BROTHER ABBOTT:—I write to assure you of my continued interest in the state work. I feel that the time has come to go forward. Our present feeble efforts are a chagrin if not a disgrace. Too many of us are at ease in Zion. It has taken most of the year to get the church here on its feet again, but I shall before the Christmas bells ring try to raise our apportionment or more." Any one who knows the struggles through which that church has passed in the last few years will recognize that such a letter means a great deal indeed. It is not claptrap, written for effect, but is the utterance of an honest, earnest heart. The next letter is from Brother I. Bauserman, of Maitland: "The work at Maitland is not at a standstill. The Bible-school is increasing in numbers and interest, the C. E. is prosperous and our congregation increasing in numbers. One addition by letter last Sunday. Our church has been newly painted and papered and will be seated anew in a few weeks, so that we will have a very comfortable and convenient place of worship. I am making a specialty of state missions in my sermons and hope for great results. Convert Missouri and the good that will flow from her to all missions cannot be estimated. This part of the state, Nodaway Valley, is waking up." This church has been straining every nerve to fix up their house; they have need, it would seem, for all the money they can raise, yet their preacher is making a specialty of state missions in his sermons. If every preacher in the state would do this it would be such a wonderful help. So many times men write that they are straining every nerve to accomplish this or that and have not the opportunity to bring up state missions. They may think that they are straining every nerve, but no man can get all the available money for any one purpose, and there is always money in any church for our work if it is asked for and urged.

REMEMBER,

the next annual convention meets in Kansas City, and that at that convention we do not want to make a report of which the church in this state needs to be ashamed. If there is a combined effort on the part of all the preachers in the state to make this year a success it will be done.

REMEMBER

again that all the money we had in the treasury to begin the year with after all debts were paid was $300. This is all gone and there is no money to carry on the work. Your board is confronted with one of two necessities: either to call the men from the field or to stir up the churches to an immediate response. They do not believe you will sanction the first and they must resort to the second. Will not the churches throughout the state at once take hold of this matter and push it so that our work may go on?

I fear this constant reiteration of this plea will become monotonous, but the work is so urgent, the demands so great and the results of abandoning the work so disastrous that I must constantly urge this matter upon you.

REMEMBER

1. There are eight countyseats in which we have no church organization.
2. That there are twenty-three countyseats where we have no church building.
3. That there are 115 towns of from 250 to 20,000 population where we have no organization.
4. That South Missouri from the discoveries of its wonderful mineral riches is looming up with wonderful importance. We must push our work here.
5. The great opportunities in our two large cities are God's call to sacrifices. What shall our answer be? Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

SCHOOL TEACHER

PULLED DOWN HILL.

"I relied on coffee so much to keep me up, having been told that it was a 'mild stimulant,' that I hardly knew what to do when I found it was really pulling me down hill. My sleep was badly broken at night and I was all unstrung. Am a school teacher and was exceedingly nervous.

"When it became evident that I was in a very bad condition, I was induced to leave off coffee and try Postum Food Coffee. Mother made it first, but none of us could endure it, it was so flat and tasteless. She proposed to throw the package away, but I said, 'Suspend judgment until we have made it strictly according to directions.' It seems she had made the Postum like she always made coffee, taking it off the stove as soon as it began to boil. Mother was so prejudiced against it that she did not care to try it again, but I got sister to make the Postum next morning strictly according to directions, that is, allow it to boil full fifteen minutes after the boiling begins.

"We were all amazed at the difference. Sister said it was better coffee, to her taste, than the old, and father, who is an elderly gentleman and had used coffee all his life, appeared to relish the Postum as well as my little brother, who took to it from the first.

"For awhile mother clung to her old favorite, although she was sick more or less of the time. Finally, one morning, she drank a cup of Postum by mistake, believing it to be coffee. We joked her so much about it, because she did not discover the difference, that she finally admitted she had occasionally taken a sip of the Postum Coffee, and from that time she proposed to use it altogether. Her health has been greatly improved, and we are all strong advocates of Postum. Please omit my name from publication." ——, Flagler, Col. Name can be given by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Three Vacancies Filled.

At the meeting of the Board of Ministerial Relief, held in Indianapolis, Nov. 14th, Simeon Frazier resigned as member of the board, and three vacancies were filled by the selection of Dr. Jabez Hall, of Irvington, and A. B. Philputt and A. L. Orcutt, of Indianapolis. A. L. Orcutt will act as recording secretary.

While the death of Bro. A. M. Atkinson, the father of and sacrifice for this work is seriously realized, the board feels that so great a work must not suffer for want of earnest advocates and supporters. There must be no halting. The work must move forward. Our worthy needy ones must not be neglected. The spirit of the Restoration demands attention to this matter. A ministry so holy appeals to the Christian conscience of every member of the church.

Brethren of the ministry, let us lay this matter upon the hearts of our people, and the response will be sure and generous. The third Lord's day in December is the time for the offering. Do not neglect it. Send to Howard Cale, 120 E. Market St., Indianapolis.

A Thanksgivings Day Gift.

On Thanksgivings eve a gift of $5,000 was received at C. W. B. M. headquarters from one of the earnest women of the Church of Christ, who desired to see that the money entrusted to her was bestowed where it would work for Christ and his church.

This gift was most opportune, for the famine cry from India is loud and long, and must be answered. Not only must we bear our part in feeding the hungry ones, but the famine is opening new doors of opportunity for us. The government is offering to place the village schools about Bilaspur in our hands. This not only means that we may reach the children, but it means open doors for preaching the gospel and comfortable rooms for holding Sunday-schools.

This gift should be but the beginning; our Lord calls for his own. Let those to whom he has given good gifts hear him saying, through the opportunities before them, "Inasmuch as ye did it to the least of these, ye did it to me."

That W. C. T. U. Resolution.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I think your criticism as to the resolution passed by the W. C. T. U. convention, of Seattle, Washington, both timely and just. But you need not have looked so far from home. The censure of Pres. McKinley's temperance policy at the Epworth League convention, at Indianapolis, or Father Clark's three rousing big cheers at Detroit convention for "the grand man who sits in the White House," would have been equally relevant; although there was no resolution passed in either case, yet there is at certain times an evasive way of censuring or endorsing a political policy without resolution, which is less manly than by resolution as employed by the Seattle ladies.

To illustrate: If, when the Venezuela contention was at its greatest heat in 1896, Mr. Cleveland had rushed the stars and stripes to the center of Canada, then just at that time to have sung, "Three cheers for the red, white and blue" in our religious conventions would have been equally an endorsement of Mr. Cleveland's policy as to have passed resolutions endorsing same. K. S. H.

[Commenting on the foregoing we would say:

1. That Seattle, Wash., is not "far from home." It is at home in the United States where the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST circulates.

2. There is a difference between the applause which an audience may give to a sentiment expressed by a speaker and the passage of a resolution. One is official, formal, the other is individual and informal.

3. Religious bodies have a right to declare themselves on the question of temperance, and to vote censure against any policy of any public official, that is contrary to the interests of temperance. They ought not, however, in our judgment, to pass resolutions of a purely political character, that have no direct bearing on the object for which the organization exists.

4. We do not believe we ought to cease honoring our flag, even in the event that the national administration should carry it where it ought not to go. We might condemn the policy, but we should respect the symbol of our nationality and of our liberty and independence.—EDITOR.]

Prevention Better than Cure.

In 1897 8 a fund of $30,000 was secured to pay off old debts against Eureka College. As an evidence of the bona fide character of these subscriptions I am glad to be enabled to announce that up to this time the collections have amounted to $30,085, and that some of the notes still remain to be collected. A valuable subscription is one that pays more than the original amount!

Our next campaign is one to increase the endowment fund to a point that it will support the institution, counting on its lowest possible attendance, and at the same time collect enough money from its owners and friends, the churches, to prevent its falling deeply into debt again.

I am asking every church in Illinois to place the college on the list of its benevolences and to make an offering and send it in not later than the middle of next June. This must be done or else the college will soon be struggling under another enormous debt. The permanent fund is growing, and this must continue. Until it is large enough in actual money safely invested to support the college, the churches must support it if it continues to do the work expected of it. Let every church in Illinois join this prevention movement at once. A small offering from every one will do the work, and will be no burden to any one.

J. H. HARDIN, Pres.

Eureka, Ill.

C. W. B. M. of Missouri.

DEAR SISTERS:—At our State Convention in Jefferson City we learned that there are more than 1,500 Christian Churches in Missouri. There are only 146 auxiliaries of the C. W. B. M., reporting to our state secretary. Have we not here a vast field for work? Surely there are hundreds of churches in which we could enlist the women in our C. W. B. M. if we had the money with which to send out organizers.

Have you not been impressed through your own auxiliary with your responsibility in spreading the "good news?" Has not your heart thrilled with joy because you have a part in this work, because you are identified with such a glorious company of workers? Then let us make a great effort to develop our state work. We can do this only by increasing our offerings to the stats fund. We have seen the gradual growth in our state, not so much a growth in the number of organizations as a growth in liberality among those already enlisted.

The time has come for us to increase our organizations that there may be a larger, more constant stream of money flowing into our national treasury, that a greater volume of prayer may ascend to the throne of God, that a larger host may join in the songs of the redeemed. The missionary work at home and abroad is a living, growing work; consequently the need for more workers is always a pressing one. Our source of supplies is the women of our churches, but so many know nothing of our work. Many are longing for a field of usefulness, for a call to greater Christian activity. Shall we not send an organizer or our secretary to them that their loving sympathy and help may be secured?

Many auxiliaries need an occasional visit from our secretary or organizer that they may be instructed and encouraged. Many have given up because they could not have this help in their time of need.

We have put our hands to the plow; let there be no looking back. The brethren are saying: "State Missions to the front!" Sisters, our watchword must be, "State Development." Thus shall we help to realize our national watchword, "100,000 women and $30,000 for 1900." Let the stress be laid on the "one hundred thousand women."

Yours in Christian love and service,

MATTIE W. BURGESS,
State Treasurer of C. W. B. M. of Missouri.

20,000 CHURCHES

Lighted by the FRINK System of Reflectors with Electric, Gas, Welsbach, Acetylene or Oil. LICENSED to manufacture electric and combination gas and electric fixtures. Send dimensions for estimate.

I. P. FRINK, 551 Pearl Street, NEW YORK.

To my Brethren in the Church and Ministry: I take pleasure at the close of several weeks' successful treatment to commend the skill and careful attention of Surgeon W. H. Mayfield. My wife has been a sufferer for many years with a complication of organic troubles, during which time she has been treated by a number of physicians without any apparent benefit whatever. A few weeks since I brought her to the Mayfield Sanitarium and placed her in the charge of Surgeon Mayfield. To his treatment and the considerate attention given by staff and nurses my wife is now a new woman physically, and for the first time in many years is free from pain and joyous in the knowledge of her restoration. In my profession as a minister of the gospel, during my stay in this life-saving institution, I was cognizant of some rare surgical operations and the subsequent rapid convalescence of these patients. Prompted by my desire to benefit the afflicted I recommend the Mayfield Sanitarium to those needing surgical attention.

Evangelistic.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Brockton, Dec. 1.—Two confessions last week.—G. A. REINL.

COLORADO.

Pueblo.—The work at the Central Church is quite encouraging. The audiences have about doubled and there have been 36 additions since July 1. There is a good feeling in the church. —C. S. EARLY.

CALIFORNIA.

San Jose, Nov. 20 —Meeting continues. Home forces. Twenty-eight additions from all sources in three weeks. Three confessions and one baptism last night. Will continue this week.—B. B. BURTON, pastor.

TEXAS.

Dallas, Nov. 24.—There were 117 added.—CHAS. REIGN SCOVILLE.

Lampasas, Dec. 1 —We are comfortably located in our home in Brownwood, and ready for evangelistic work. We are assisting Bro. C. W. Worden here in a meeting. Prospects good.—MORGAN MORGANS AND DAUGHTER.

OREGON.

Eugene, Nov. 23.—A revival with M. L. Rose pastor and D. C. Kellems evangelist, began at this place 13 days ago with 32 additions to date. Meetings will continue indefinitely. Bro. Kellems is one of our strong men and holds his audience spell-bound.—GEO. A. WEBB, singing evangelist.

ARKANSAS.

Siloam Springs, Nov. 23.—We began a meeting here the 21st. A good interest is manifested and we look for splendid results. We have a fine church building and the brethren have just paid the $500 loan to the Church Extension and "owe no man anything."—ELLIS PURLEE, Stafford, Kan.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Norman, Nov. 26.—The meetings at this place continues with 66 additions. Bro. J. S. Haddock, of Bells, Tenn., is doing the preaching. The interest is splendid despite the inclement weather. The church is prosperous. There have been 144 additions since the 1st of January, '99, when we began the work here.—W. A. WHERRY, pastor.

KENTUCKY.

Lexington, Nov. 28.—I am assisting F. B. Walker in a meeting at Winchester, Ky.; 50 have been added in the first 15 days and the interest is very deep. Forty-three have been added here at Central Church since the 10th of September at our regular services. Our Sunday school reached its high-water mark last Sunday night and will expect many additions from it very soon.—I. J. SPENCER.

TENNESSEE.

Johnson City, Nov. 23.—We have just closed a meeting of two weeks' duration at this place, our pastor, A. A. Ferguson doing the preaching. The meeting resulted in 50 accessions; 41 from the world. We consider this a great victory for the cause of Christ in this place, as all the denominations have tried to hold meetings within the last year or two and have made comparative failures. There were two more added at our prayer-meeting last evening. The outlook is very bright.—ADAM B. CROUCH.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Beaver Falls, Dec. 2.—I close my work here to-morrow and take the pastorate at Perry, Lake County, O., Dec. 10. In my four and a half years' work here there have been added 186 persons—more than were on the roll when I came. The church is in a condition to move on to greater achievements under the leadership of some good pastor. The flourishing church at Beaver, five miles from here, was established partially by the efforts of the brethren here and those dismissed from this congregation.—O. A. RICHARDS.

MICHIGAN.

Saginaw.—Closed 16 days' meeting at Arbela; 19 came forward. One recently baptized at Saginaw.—WM. A. WARD.

Yale, Nov. 28.—Prof. Humphrey closed his meeting with us last Thursday evening, preaching 20 days with 20 added, mostly aged people. Membership revived.—D. MCCALL, pastor.

Owosso, Nov. 1.—Recently closed a meeting at West Haven for Bro. I. Conkle, of Henderson's, which resulted in 12 coming to Christ and the organization of a church and practically bringing to us Union property worth at least $2,000. Bro. Conkle preaches there Lord's day afternoons and is doing a good work there, also at Henderson and Easton, living at the former place. Our work here is moving forward.—S. A. STRAWN.

NEBRASKA.

Plattsmouth, Nov. 27.—Large audiences yesterday. In the morning I addressed the Junior C. U. A. M. in a Thanksgiving sermon. Two confessions at evening service. Work progressing in all lines.—R. M. DUNGAN.

Harvard, Dec 2.—Fine interest. Thirteen additions. Bro. Gregg, the pastor, is doing good practical work. We join Bro. Atwood, of Kansas, in a meeting at Red Cloud, Neb., beginning the 6th. On account of previous arrangements we close our work here Tuesday night for that meeting. Bro. G. will continue during the week. We pray for the work in Nebraska.—F. HOWARD SWEETMAN.

KANSAS.

Elk City.—One addition Nov. 12th.—S. W. NAY.

Liberal, Nov. 21.—I am here in a meeting. Bro. U. G. Sutherlin is leading song service. Good crowds and good interest.—E. M CARR, Dodge City, Kan.

Harper, Nov. 27.—I filled Bro. Purlee's pulpit Sunday morning and evening; had good audiences. There were four baptisms.—G. W. HANNA.

Atchison, Nov. 24.—Have just closed a short meeting with 19 additions; 14 by baptism. Have $500 more raised to pay on mortgage, making over $1,200 debts paid since I came.—W. S. PRIEST.

Closed a four weeks' meeting at Pardee, Nov. 24th with seven additions; four by baptism. Bro. Claud Haskell, the pastor, preached five days and had one confession. One addition at Round Prairie at regular services on Nov. 26, and two at Oskaloosa, Kansas, on Nov. 12.—R. A. THOMPSON.

ILLINOIS.

Sullivan, Nov. 27.—We will have union Thanksgiving services here. The writer will preach the sermon. Two more accessions since last report.—E. W. BRICKERT, pastor.

Atlanta, Nov. 26.—Our meeting here still continues with fine interest. There have been 15 conversions to date. The writer is doing the preaching.—W. R. JINNETT.

Blandinsville, Nov. 23. Two more additions to the Old Bedford Church since my last report. More to follow.—A. R. ADAMS.

Mechanicsburg Nov. 25.—We have had four additions to date. My next meeting will be with Bro. Roy Caldwell, of Woodward, Iowa. —V. E RIDENOUR, singer.

Paxton, Nov. 24.—Our meeting here with Pastor W. L. Luck starts off well. Good interest and attendance. Am ready to make engagements for the new year.—C. M. HUGHES, singing evangelist.

Mt. Olivet.—Ten accessions last night; 16 in all in two weeks. J. C. Lappin, the pastor, will continue a few nights. Go to Saunemin next —S. S. LAPPIN, state evangelist.

INDIANA.

Elwood.—All is going well here now in the church work.—L. C. HOWE, pastor.

Goshen, Nov. 29.—Just closed a week's meeting at Independence, resulting in one baptism.—E. P. GROW.

Dana, Nov. 23.—Bro. S. G. Smith, Ladoga, with us Monday and Tuesday evenings. Preaching good sermons. One young lady made the good confession.—B. F. BOLINGER.

Hartford City, Nov. 27.—Just closed a good meeting with 10 additions. Bro. E. W Kerr, of Gallatin, Mo., led the singing and did it well. He will render efficient service in this line, wherever needed.—C. M. KEENE.

Shelbyville, Nov. 27.—I have been here two months and have had eight additions at regular services. Preached eight funerals and solemnized four marriages. Our house is not large enough to hold the Sunday night audiences.—E. FINLEY MAHAN.

Thorntown, Nov. 23.—Our meeting here conducted by Bro. L. E. Brown, of Frankfort, closed last night. There were 27 accessions to the church. The entire town and community was stirred up and many were caused to search the Scriptures to see if these things were true. Bro. Brown is a strong preacher. The church has been built up in the most holy faith and is in good condition for aggressive work.—LEE TINSLEY, pastor.

MISSOURI.

Ashland.—Twelve additions; Armstrong, five additions.—G. A. HOFFMANN.

Warrensburg, Nov. 23.—Closed a meeting last night for the church at Schell City with 13 additions. Have been called for another year there.—A. STERLING

Bowling Green, Nov. 26.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting at Louisville, with 21 additions, an old church debt raised, new organ secured for the service, and a spirit of unity and concord manifested on the part of the congregation.—S. WALLACE MARR.

Higginsville, Nov. 25.—I began work here on the 12 h of this month. This is my second term as pastor of this church. The people have received us most kindly. There have been six additions. The church is hopeful and the prospect encouraging.—L. H. OTTO.

Palmyra, Nov. 24.—Have just closed a two weeks' meeting with nine additions. J. H. Wood, of Shelbina, did the preaching. His sermons were on a high plane, both spiritually and intellectually, and we are all better for his having been among us.—L. J. MARSHALL, pastor.

Kansas City.—The meeting at Prospect Christian Church, conducted by J. V. Coombs, closed with 141 accessions; 33 one day and 29 another day. The congregation was without a pastor and very much disorganized. The meeting not only added many to the congregation, but created a religious activity among the membership. An excellent pastor will be at work there in a few days. Jan. 1st Bro. Coombs begins at Pittsfield.

IOWA.

Bedford.—Evangelists Romig and Jones will begin a meeting here Dec. 12. Brethren, pray for the success of our meeting here.—J. WILL WALTERS.

Pleasantville, Nov. 27.—Three added by baptism Nov. 23rd. Two made the good confession Nov. 25th at regular services.—F. D. FERRALL, pastor.

Wapello, Nov. 28.—Three additions by baptism at my appointment, at Atalissa, since our short meeting in October.—CHAS. BLANCHARD.

Prescott, Nov. 28 —We are in a good meeting with Pastor Leake; meeting one week old, five added, house full, interest fine. This is our fourth meeting with the Prescott Church. —W. B. CREWDSON.

Webster City, Nov. 27.—Thirty-five addition at Webster City and Cass Center in the last month. G. M. Goode, of Normal, has assisted in a meeting. I have never heard the gospel more ably presented. G. M. Goode is a man of sterling worth and a genuine Christian gentleman. I would not ask for a better fellow laborer. He raised about $400 for local expenses. I believe it is the general opinion that the congregation is in the best spiritual and financial condition of its history.—W. A. MOORE.

Arlington, Dec. 2.—Twenty-three added at Volga City, a pastor located and finance in good condition. Bro. Fisher is a good man, comes highly recommended by Iowa state board. The people have fallen in love with him on first sight. May they long live together in this holy service. Bro. W. M. Hollett, with whom I am now in a meeting here, assisted us very much by his happy songs and good company.—D. D. BOYLE, evangelist.

Leave, O Leave Me Faith Alway!

MRS. LISA A. FLETCHER.

Whatever Thou mayst deem as wise
In higher wisdom to decree,
Whatever cherished earthly prize
Thou dost, dear Lord, withhold from me,
Though rare may bloom the flowers of May,
Leave, oh leave me faith alway!

Whatever earthly treasures fade
Of glad or sweet this life holds dear,
Howe'er chill the lingering shade,
And strange and dark the way appear,
Yet ever to Thee will I pray,
Leave, oh leave me faith alway!

The Lost Emigrants.

BY R. H. JOHNSON.

CHAPTER II.

The following days, as we crossed the latitude of the capes of ominous names, Fear and Lookout, were days of storm and angry sea and we were compelled to stay below; for seasickness, inevitable to those uninitiated into the mysteries of the sea, came with its unmeasured miseries. "Inevitable?" cries the reader. "Why, I have crossed the Atlantic and was not seasick for a single hour." True: but there's a world of difference between the great ocean liner to-day, several hundred feet in length and of ten thousand tons, that cleaves its way through the mighty waves, and feels well-nigh as firm under foot as the solid land, and a three or four hundred ton sailing vessel that is tossed by the waves like a bubble in a caldron. Will you, sir or madam, try a voyage around Cape Horn in a vessel of the latter description? If you accomplish it without mal de mer I will concede your right to boast.

Directing our course to the southeast, the Bahamas, West Indies, Caribbes and Barbadoes were in succession passed on our right. And finding the air genial and the sea calm, we spent much time on deck. My father improved rapidly in the milder atmosphere. These were delightful days as we swept over summer seas, and pleasant were the acquaintances formed.

It is due to the reader who will accompany us on this voyage that I introduce some of these. There was Captain Wolcott, a hearty, good-natured seadog, with a good word for every one. And there was his wife, a quiet, retiring, sweet-spirited woman. A very pleasant acquaintance was Maria Clarkson, a young and pretty orphan, educated with a view to following the profession of teacher, on her way to friends in Sacramento, with a prospect of a position in the city schools. She was a little older than I, and we soon became fast friends.

Then there was Jack Burton, a young man of culture and some means, who hoped to go into business in California. He and Dr. Andral, ship's surgeon, soon became genial companions. Of the latter I may say, after the completion of his literary education—he had just graduated from a medical college of Philadelphia—desiring to go West to engage in his profession had been installed by his uncle, the captain, as ship's surgeon for the voyage. And here I will add that my delightful impressions of Mr. and Mrs. Gray were only deepened on a fuller acquaintance.

Among our fellow passengers were two very interesting and excellent people, Professor Fergus and wife. The former was a well-informed and withal a very eccentric man. He seemed when on deck forever with a book in his hand, yet free to converse and at home on any topic. But the moment there was a hiatus in the talk he would plunge into his book and become at once oblivious to everything going on around him, whether it was a passing ship or any one of the thousand and one things that set people all agog at sea. I have known him to sit on deck lost in a book through the dinner hour, because he had neither heard the bell nor seen the passengers go below, his wife with a headache having failed to arouse him.

My father enjoyed his society very much. The more so because the professor was always ready to discuss religious themes that are so dear to the student of theology. In his presence my father became jubilant and more sociable than he had been for weeks.

One day early in their acquaintance the talk was directed to the Lutheran Church. "And how soon," said Mr. Fergus, "do you expect all Christians to come to the Lutheran name and faith?"

"However pleasing that might be to me," said father, "I cannot hope for it."

"Why not? Don't you believe it to be the true church?"

"It represents my views better than any other or I would not hold to it," said father.

"Well then, as you want all to come to the truth you ought to ask all to come to your position."

"By no means, Professor; others are just as honest in their views as I. Moreover, the great diversity of religions denominations is adapted to the varying culture, taste and inclinations of the people. Thus the rich, the poor, the fashionable, the plain, the cultured, the ignorant, the liberal and the narrow can each find the church of his choice."

"Did the Savior originate this diversity of churches of which you speak?"

"Certainly not. The church as instituted by him was one. This diversity was the result of divisions in after ages.

"Very true. Jesus calls it 'my church.' 'He is the Head of the body, the church.' The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and one soul' (Acts 4:32). Can you imagine a more perfect unity than that? And if Christ's church was one of perfect unity, did he make a mistake in so organizing it, thereby preventing each one from having a church just to suit his fancy? May not the sin of apostasy lie at the door of the modern go-as-you-please churches?"

"Certainly there was no mistake on the Savior's part in making his church a unit. But remember, that church was under the inspired direction of the apostles; otherwise its unity could not have been possible."

"Well, then, as we have the same inspired direction now in the New Testament, let us get under it as soon as possible. Again, you will admit, Doctor, that the conditions are far more favorable to religious unity now than in the days of the apostles. Then the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans and despised the Gentile 'dogs.' Then every nation was a foe to every other nation, and the world was divided into warring tribes and factions.

"Now the gospel and steam and lightning have broken all barriers down and the whole world is akin. Then everything was in the way of union; yet Christians despite this were one. Now everything is favorable to unity, and Christians are divided into contending factions, for the one reason that they are insubordinate to the will of Jesus.

"If we could bow our rebellious wills and pray in our very souls, 'Thy will be done;' if we could feel but a thousandth part of the burden that rested so heavily on the heart of Jesus, when he prayed for all believers that they all might 'be one as thou, Father art in me and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me' (Jno. 17:21); could we feel but a feather's weight of that burden, I say sectarianism would perish as frost before the sun, and the invincible argument of a united church would compel the world's belief.

"Do you not know that the great mass of the people, even in our Christian land, so called, refuses to attend the churches? That while they have a profound respect for Jesus of Nazareth they have little for the churches and for the preachers? I say this in sorrow and alarm. Why is this, do you ask? Because they see that the churches have departed far from the simplicity of the gospel of Jesus: because they see that the preachers are not leading their hearers to follow in his steps; because they see the church rent into a hundred fragments, and meeting houses confronting each other across the streets, 'looking,' as Dr. Holmes expresses it, 'like fighting-cocks with their necks straight up in the air, as if they would flap their roofs, the next thing, and crow out of their upstretched steeples and peck at each other's glass eyes with their sharp-pointed weather cocks.' That's what we are doing—pecking at each other and pulling each other down when we ought to be standing shoulder to shoulder and winning the world to Christ. And thousands of thoughtful people with souls to save are standing aloof from all this pitiful confusion and concluding that religion is a farce."

"That's so," said Captain Wolcott, who had been listening for some moments. "Many years ago I went up for prayers at what they called a union revival, and they got to pulling and hauling at me and trying to tow me to all points of the compass at once; and I lost my bearings and dropped their towlines and said: "I'll just wait till the Lord's ship comes along and then ask for a line; and I realize that the whole business with the other crafts has been bad for me.

"I tell you, there is many an earnest soul gone to the—the dogs, because of the everlasting scramble of the crews under different flags after the passengers.

"But let's go to dinner. Didn't you hear the bell?"

Wishing.

Do you wish the world were better?
Let me tell you what to do:
Set a watch upon your actions,
Keep them always straight and true.
Rid your mind of selfish motives,
Let your thought be clean and high;
You can make a little Eden
Of the sphere you occupy.

Do you wish the world were wiser?
Well, suppose you make a start,
By accumulating wisdom
In the scrapbook of your heart.
Do not waste one page on folly;
Live to learn, and learn to live.
If you want to give men knowledge
You must get it ere you give.

Do you wish the world were happy?
Then remember day by day
Just to scatter seeds of kindness
As you pass along the way;
For the pleasure of the many
May be ofttimes traced to one,
As the hand that plants an acorn
Shelters armies from the sun.

How Civilization Clung to Witchcraft.

In Lecky's History of Rationalism in Europe will be found the story of the long and weary struggle by which witchcraft was finally relegated to the limbo of unbelievable things. It has perished so utterly that we fail to have any realistic sense of the devastation and death which it produced. During the Long Parliament three thousand persons were put to death by legal executions alone, and Doctor Sprenger estimates that during the Christian epoch nine millions of people were burned as witches and wizards. All manner of torture was inflicted, all manner of horrible deaths, and upon the most amazing and grotesque testimony, whereof the curious may see specimens in Calef's Satan's Invisible World Displayed. It seems impossible that human beings of the white race could have acted so like the beasts that perish. Only two hundred and fifteen years ago an English Court of Justice, with Sir Matthew Hale, the upright Judge, and Sir Thomas Brown, the wise philosopher, for central figures, murdered two women because they were witches, thus enacting a scene the parallel of which can be witnessed to-day only in the jungles of Central Africa among a people so brutal that it would hardly be a sin to doubt their connection with the human race. From the time when Wierus in Germany, in 1563, first among men, proclaimed his disbelief, to the time when the laws against witches were repealed in Austria, in 1766, is a period of two hundred years. But while we exercise our minds with astonishment over the laggard pace at which the great army of humanity past. Whenever I think of the practice of war, and especially of a scene once described to me of an artillery battalion ordered in a great emergency instantly to take position, galloping across a field strewn thick with wounded, crunching under remorseless wheels the quivering limbs and bodies of yet living men and striking out with fierce horse-hoofs the brains of the helpless, I feel the assured hope that in the not distant future there will live on the earth a generation of men to whom such descriptions will seem like stories of another world. But such hopes have been among the aspirations of prophets and poets for three thousand years.—Thos. B. Reed, in the Saturday Evening Post.

A Government Inquiry is being made by the United States Senate Food Commission into the matter of food adulteration, now so prevalent.

Twice before the United States Government has made inquiries as to the ingredients and quality of the baking powders of the market.

Each time the government report has shown Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder of highest leavening strength, a grape cream of tartar powder of sterling worth, and absolutely pure and wholesome.

This is very gratifying, for Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder is depended upon by millions of people to raise their daily bread.

PRICE BAKING POWDER CO., CHICAGO.

NOTE.—These Government inquiries also developed the fact that there are many mixtures upon the market made in imitation of baking powder, but containing alum or other caustic acid whose use in food is dangerous.

A Catechism for the Infidel.

A man who has had experience in dealing with scepticism suggests that when an infidel comes with his criticisms and cavils he be asked to answer the following questions:

"1. Can you say you have ever read the Bible carefully through, and you could now bear to be examined in it? 2. Have you not read whatever part you have read rather desiring to pick holes in it than honestly to find out the truth? 3. What do you propose to put in its place that shall be more likely to be beneficial to mankind? 4. How do you account for the inequalities in the moral government of the world? 5. How do you account for the unhappy deaths of Voltaire, Rousseau, Hume, Paine and others? 6. How do you account for the fact that most infidels are men of immoral lives? 7. How is it that Christianity has done so very much more to benefit the world at large than infidelity has ever attempted?"

A writer in the Herald and Presbyter, quoting the above, testifies that he has known personally two infidels who were converted and became ministers of the gospel by simply reading the Bible. They did not know the book, and were prejudiced against it by false statements in regard to it and garbled extracts from it. It is only another proof that, as some one has wisely said, "The best treatise on the inspiration of the Scriptures is the Scriptures themselves."—Union Gospel News.

Bobby's Mamma—Now, mind, Bobby, if they pass you the cake a second time at the party, you must say: "No, thanks, I've had plenty." And don't you forget it. Hostess (at the party)—Won't Bobby have some more cake? Bobby (who hasn't forgotten)—Nope, thanks. I've had enough, an' don't you fergit it!—Cleveland Plaindealer.

"Seeing is believing." You can see what Hood's Sarsaparilla has done for others, and must believe it will do the same for you."

The Song of the Lightning.

I leave my home in the angry cloud;
I speak in the thunder's roar;
I shiver the oak and the hemlock proud
And rend the rocks ashore.
I hiss and sing through the ocean's wave;
I tear down the works of man;
I mete out death to the legion brave;
I thwart the best laid plan.

I have my throne in the tempest car,
And I visit the earth at will;
I speed the news o'er the metal wire
And reck not vale or hill.
I run the motor; I turn the wheel;
I light, I cook, I spin;
I play the wizard; I print, I heal—
The race with light I win.

I stand for horses without their feed;
For steam without its gear;
For water; for wind; and I never need
A moment's rest in a year.
I need no eyes; I could use no ears;
I feel no heat or cold;
I work right on for a thousand years
And ne'er grow lame or old.

Oh! I am a worker of wondrous mien—
No rival at all have I.
My deeds of valor and force are seen
In land and sea and sky.
And yet I own one ruling power.
I answer in mute accord
My master man; and at every hour
I honor him as my lord.

And when I run my chosen way
Along my metal wire,
Although a giant, I will obey
My Master Man's desire.
And yet a higher one I confess
My Maker; my God above—
Who rules all things in righteousness,
Whose rule is peace and love.

Personal Example.

C. H. WETHERBE.

Personal example varies according to the ability and moral character which one may possess. It is well said that the example of every person has its influence, either in a good way or in a bad way. The man, however, who possesses unusual ability and who occupies a high official position is more likely to set a forceful and outreaching example than is he whose ability is very small and who occupies a humble position among the common people.

But I wish to state a few words about the example of a Christian who, for what he regards as being good reasons, refuses to attend the church to which he belongs. I have in mind a minister, not now a pastor, who sometime ago decided that he could no longer practically support the pastor of his church, as that pastor had proved to be utterly unfit morally for his position. This man remained away from the services of his church. Some of his friends suggested that in doing so he was not setting a good example. They thought that he ought to attend the services for the sake of giving an example of steadfast adherence to the cause of Christ. But they failed to look at the other side of the question. That minister believes that if he were to attend the ministry of the pastor his own example would be a practical endorsement of a bad man. He would be fellowshiping an example which is totally unworthy of that of a gospel minister. This is a sound position. It is sustained by Paul's writings. No one would hesitate to say that the Christian who would make a practice of keeping company with a man whom he knows to be licentious and whose general reputation is such, would set a bad and damaging example. He would be fellowshiping a bad man. Is it any less true of the Christian who sustains a bad pastor? No. The example of refusing to co-operate with a pastor who is positively unfit to be in the ministry is vastly better than that of supporting him.

The Way to Prosper.

Personal prosperity should be sought because by it we build up character and can better advance the kingdom of Christ. But how can we be sure to thrive? Since mind and motive are most important factors, we begin with the spiritual essentials and name the industrial afterward.

1. Live an humble, consistent Christian life. A teachable, spiritual mind, walking humbly with God, is best fitted for insight, prudence and action.

2. Keep the Lord's day holy. Walking, religious rest keeps up the tone of mind, invigorates the judgment and renews the bodily strength.

3. Attend the midweek prayer-meeting, for it is a bulwark against an overweight of care. Active business is promoted by so safe and refreshing a let-up in the midst of the six working days.

4. Be regular in family and personal devotions. Thus to keep the affections and motives well balanced is a protection against those misjudgments, notions and mere conceits which are so disastrous to business.

5. Work, but do not overwork; be busy, but never hurry. Energy of will and nerve and muscle must be wrought into every enterprise.

6. Promise only with great care to fulfill. A promise kept is a credit and source of strength; a promise forgotten, neglected or broken is a weakness and a damage as well as a wrong.

7. Be careful of debits and credits; watch the maturity of claims; pay promptly and collect carefully. Always thank a creditor for notice, but settle without waiting for it. Do not allow a debtor to slip along without due but courteous notice.

8. Closely watch your cash and all other assets. Let not value leak out in driblets by folly or neglect. Repairs and paints and cash accounts are good preservatives.

9. Give systematically. To give one-tenth of income, thoughtfully and conscientously, fosters prosperity, through the divine blessings, by promoting the habit of watchfulness and a sober, healthful frame of mind.—Ex.

Put up the Sword.

I have sung of the soldier's glory
As I never shall sing again;
I have gazed on the shambles gory,
I have smelled of the slaughter pen.

There is blood in the inkwell clotted,
There are stains on the laurel leaf,
And the pages of fame are blotted
With the tears of a needless grief.

A bird is slaughtered for fashion,
And the beast is killed for sport;
And never the word compassion
Is whispered at Moloch's court.

For the parent seal in the water
Is slain, and her child must die,
That some sister or wife or daughter
Her beauty may beautify.

And the merciful thought we smother—
For such is the way of man—
As we murder the useless mother
For the "unborn astrakhan."

But a season of rest comes never
For the rarest sport of all;
Will his patience endure forever,
Who noteth a sparrow's fall?

When the volleys of hell are sweeping
The sea and the battle plain,
Do you think that our God is sleeping,
And never to wake again?

When hungry and ravenous fever
Are slaying the wasted frame,
Shall we worship the red deceiver,
The devil that men call Fame?

We may swing the censer to cover
The odor of blood—in vain;
God asks us, over and over,
"Where is thy brother, Cain?"

Going Home.

It was a night express down in Missouri. Stretched across two seats lay an old man, whose pale face and withered features told of illness and suffering. Close by his side sat a wee tot of a girl—scarce ten years old—whose tender blue eyes watched every movement of the old grandfather. Nothing broke the silence of their corner save the roar of the train, and an occasional cough from the old man.

Presently the withered form looked up to its young mistress and faintly whispered, "air we almost there, Margery?"

"Yes, grandpa, dear. Only a few more miles."

Leaning across the aisle I asked the little girl where they were going.

"Down to Osceola, sir," she said. "You see, sir, grandpa's sick—been sick for a long time, sir—he keeps gettin' worse an' worse."

"We're there now, Margery," broke in the old man, peering forth into the moonlight. "See, on the hill yonder, that's the place, Margery, that's the place!"

"In a few minutes we'll be there, grandpa, dear." Then turning to me, the little girl continued: "I'm takin' grandpa back to his old home, sir—back where I was born—back where mother an' grandma are buried." Then, after wiping away a tear, she smiled and went on. "Yes, I have had a pretty hard time of it: but everybody's been good to me. Come from away out in Kansas, sir; grandpa kept wantin' to go back. So when he got able I started with him. There's no one left now, sir, but just us two—him an' me, me an' him, sir, that's all. He thinks he'll get better back in old Osceola; but I don't know. You see, sir, he's nearly eighty."

Then turning to the old man, and smoothing his snow-white hair, she said: "Oh! he's fallen asleep. I'm so glad; it's the first time's he's slept since we started."

The engine gave a long, shrill whistle; the brakeman entered, and softly closing the door, called out, Os-ce-ola! Os-ce-ola!"

"Come, grandpa: come, grandpa, dear, we're home now. Come, let me wrap you up good an' warm! See, grandpa, on the hill yonder; that's the graveyard where grandma is buried. Come, wake up, grandpa, dear, wake up, wake up!"

The moon hid her face behind a passing cloud, grandma's grave was left in darkness, the little traveler wrapped her shawl around the withered form, the bell ceased to vibrate, the train gave a jerk, the brakes let go the wheels, and all was quiet.

Grandpa had reached his home.—Edwin L. Baker, in the Alkehest for November.

ARE YOUR KIDNEYS WEAK?

Kidney Weakness Caused by Overwork, by Lifting or a Strain.

We do not always know the constant danger that confronts us through all the daily walks of life. It may be an accident ar sudden illness, or perhaps, a disease that has been stealing upon us from day to day.

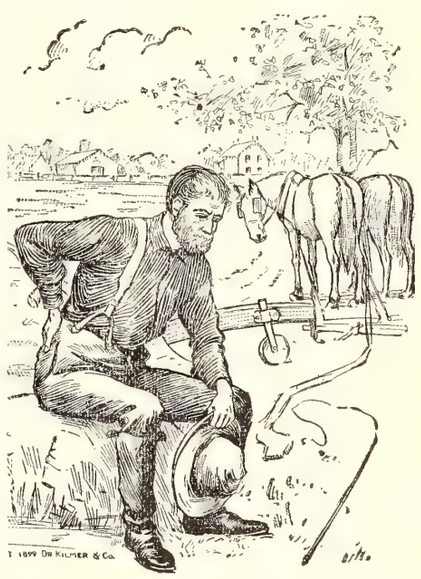
It used to be considered that only urinary troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

Now by this is not meant that you should overlook all the other organs and merely look after the kidneys.

Your other organs may need attention—but your kidneys most because they do most.

If you are sick begin taking Swamp-Root the great kidney remedy, because as soon as your kidneys are well, they will help all the other organs to health.

The kidneys may get weak or diseased from a thousand and one causes; from overwork, worry, a simple cold, from lifting, a strain, or excess in high living.



Others may suffer from diabetes, dropsy, swelling of the feet and ankles, rheumatism, bad blood, gout, gravel, catarrh of the bladder, sleeplessness, anæmia, nervousness, headache or neuralgia.

All these symptoms are due to kidney trouble, and the most prompt and effectual cure is Dr.Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy.

In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to nature, for Swamd-Root is the most perfect healer and gentle aid to the kidneys that is known to medical science.

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on arising about two ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If, on examination, it is milky or cloudy, if there is brickdust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Swamp-Root should at once be taken upon the least sign of ill health. It will make you well, and is for sale the world over in bottles of two sizes and two prices, fifty-cent and one dollar.

Swamp-Root is used in the leading hospitals, recommended by skillful physicians in their private practice; and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy for kidney, liver and bladder troubles.

To prove its wonderful efficacy, send your name and address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., mentioning that you read this generous offer in the ST. LOUIS CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, when you will receive, free of charge, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a valuable book, by mail, prepaid. This book contains many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured.

My Good Poems.

TO THE DEAR, SWEET PUBLIC: Two years ago my "Drab Book" made its magnificent debut before the whole world, and it has never ceased debuting from that time to this. I rightly predicted the overwhelming joy with which it would be received by you, and I warned the world to prepare for the agitation and storms that would quickly arise from its advent.

In six months after its appearance the war with Spain had begun and ended, to our eternal glory.

The war now raging in South Africa can be traced to the appearance of the Drab Book in that far-off land. Some will tell you that British love of gold is causing the trouble, but this is not true, as I have learned through my agents.

It may be thought by some philanthropists that I was reckless in throwing so large a mass of fundamental facts, sublime truths and profound philosophy upon the intellectual world in a single volume, but I need hardly inform such that human progress demands a certain amount of agitation and bloodshed, and the quicker it occurs the better it will be for humanity.

The war with Spain, during which the latter swept the oceans, top and bottom, with her fleets, making it necessary for our government to charter every available seagoing craft, prevented my publishers from sending the large fleets which they had contemplated for carrying my Drab Book to all parts of the world, and especially to Equatorial Africa.

In order to avoid future calamities of this kind, and to facilitate the rapid and safe distribution of my books to the Hottentots, Pygmies, and other great nations of the Dark Continent. My publishers are planning the construction of a tunnel under the Atlantic, from the southern end of Florida to the mouth of the Congo River in Equatorial Africa. I have already advised the digging of this tunnel, and I have offered to share the expense equally with my publishers out of the profits on my books in the near future.

It is estimated that the tunnel can be economically ventilated by diverting into it the West India hurricanes which sweep the Florida Coast, and in the absence of a hurricane at the proper time, some retired political orator will be employed to utter a few blasts of his trumpet into the mouth of the tunnel.

I have estimated that there are in the whole world at present 2,135,417,321 people and that the number is increasing at a reasonable rate.

After the most careful calculation it is certain to my mind that at least 2,014,843,217 of these people will want to obtain at the earliest possible moment a copy of each of my books. The profits to me on these sales will be not less than 25 cents per volume. This solves the question as to whether or not there will ever be a billionaire. I love arithmetic.

I am not boasting, nor unduly elated, but I am telling the plain truth. I am devising benevolent schemes by which to prevent this vast accumulation of wealth from working me injury.

I will say that up to the present time, out of respect to my neighbors, I have not greatly changed my method of living. I admit, however, that its ostentation has been somewhat but not offensively increased during the past year. For example, I have applied to my front gate a coat of whitewash with an old scrubbing brush, at an expense of two cents for lime. One of my neighbors out of jealousy remarked to me, "You are putting on a good deal of style this spring."

The surplus of whitewash I applied to the hitching post and the chicken coop. I could see that it made the sole occupant of the coop more happy in his domestic relations. But the neighbor's calf licked the whitewash off of the hitching post in order to get the included salt, so that venture of mine was loss of both labor and materials. I threatened suit.

In addition to the above extras, my wife has purchased for two cents a new working apron, and the children have had five cents' worth of chewing gum and a ride on the Bell Line street cars. I must admit, therefore, that my method of living, as a whole, has grown somewhat more ostentatious.

My greatest achievement in financial matters, and that of which I am proudest, is that I have, during the past year, more than doubled my contribution for Christian missions.

I had been in the habit of contributing twelve cents a year for this holy purpose, which was just one cent per month on an average. This amount I had managed to save by undergoing a good deal of self-denial, by deducting it from my monthly allowance which I set aside for my personal expenses, i. e., for cigars.

During the past year I suddenly increased my contribution from twelve up to twenty-five cents per year, which was an increase of 108 1-3 per cent. I had intended, however, to make the increase only 100 per cent. by giving 24 instead of 25 cents, but our deacon who is usually well supplied with copper cents on missionary days, could not, at that time, return to me the odd cents, although I requested him to do so. The reason why he did not have the cent was that I was the first one to whom he brought the hat for contribution. I had told him that I was going to largely increase my contribution, and so he came to me first in order to make some of the less liberal brethren feel ashamed on account of their lukewarmness in giving for missions.

In a few years I hope to be able to increase my contribution again, although I may never be able to double the amount at any one time. May the good Lord bless and take care of all of our missionaries both at home and abroad.

I have never yet been able to understand why it is that if we are willing to send missionaries to the heathen that the heathen cannot afford to support them. This would be a great relief to me and to my numerous over-liberal brethren. A. FAIRHURST.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Boys' and Girls' Rally Day.

Boys' and Girls' Rally Day is being observed by a number of Sunday-schools with uniform reports of a delightful day and liberal offerings.

It is found easy to interest the boys and girls in Home Missions. If we give them opportunity our boys and girls will give as much for winning America to Christ as to any good cause and will not decrease their offerings to other causes.

As there never was a child that was an infidel, so there is not a child in our Sunday-schools who is anti missionary.

We ask that every superintendent will give the boys and girls an opportunity to help preach the glorious gospel of the Son of God throughout America.

Remember that 40 per cent. of this offering is sent by us to the State Board of Missions. Remember that we furnish the exercises, collection banks, certificates, etc., free of cost.

If you have not planned to observe this day, please do so yet.

ADDRESS, CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING CO.,
1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

We propose, you know, to double our subscription list this year with the aid of our present readers. Every one of those who are now subscribers are expected to send at least one new subscriber. Shall we be disappointed in this reasonable expectation?

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST one year and the Genuine Oxford Self-Pronouncing Worker's Bible for $2.50 is still exceedingly popular. If you prefer the American Revised Reference Bible, send $3 25.

Our Thanksgiving number was so well received that we will issue a Christmas number with a colored cover on Dec. 21st.

We are greatly encouraged by the way some of our friends are responding to our call for them to co-opeyate in extending the circulation of the Great National Journal of our brotherhood. May we not receive the prompt and ready assistance of all? If you appreciate the work the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is doing, now is the time to show it.

We have a limited number of Funk and Wagnalls' Standard Dictionary which we offer as a premium for new subscribers to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. This is one of the finest dictionaries of the English language ever compiled. It consists of 2,318 pages bound in two splendid volumes. Each book measures 9 1-2 inches by 12 1-2 inches, 2 3-4 inches thick and weighs about 10 pounds. The set of two volumes weighs a little less than 20 pounds. Each volume has a thumb index, is bound in the best morocco binding, is beautiful to look upon and is helpful and durable.

In this office we have been using a similar set for almost five years and can speak knowingly concerning the substantial qualities of the volumes as well as their usefulness. The sets we offer are bran-new and guaranteed all right in every respect. The retail price of this magnificent work is twenty-six dollars. Send us twenty five new subscribers to the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST at One Dollar and Fifty-cents each and we will ship you a set of two volumes of the Standard Dictionary. They will be sent by freight or express, as you may direct; transportation charges to be paid by you. Names accompanied by Thirty-seven Dollars and Fifty-cents must all be sent at one time as we have only a few sets of the dictionaries and can not promise to hold them for any one.

If your list is received after all are gone we will notify you promptly and await your orders. We speak the sober truth when we say that this is an exceptional offer; a bargain which will not be offered to you every day. If your pastor's study is not already supplied with this dictionary, what a fine Christmas present it would make. Our stock will scarcely last until after Christmas on these terms.

"Excelsior" is still our motto; especially as regards quality. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the year 1900 will exceed even its own good record in this respect. Our editor has been busily engaged in securing for the columns of our journal the very best and most consecrated talent. See editor's announcement elsewhere in this issue. Will you assist this department in reaching a much larger circle of readers such as is justified by the quality of our pages?

Copies of this paper will reach some who are not at present subscribers. To such we extend an invitation to subscribe at the rate printed in this paper. You need not fear that you will not be getting the same rate as all other subscribers. According to our code the published and "special" price are the same.

NEW INVENTION A $12 Bath Cabinet FOR ONLY $5.00

Our New 1902 Style Square Quaker Folding Turkish Bath Cabinet

GUARANTEED TO BE THE BEST OF ALL CABINETS at any price, or your money cheerfully refunded.

Engraved from Photograph.

Ready for use when received.
No setting up.
No trouble; No bother.
WE HAVE BEEN MAKING GENUINE BATH CABINETS FOR YEARS.

COULD NOT BE BETTER MADE, MORE CONVENIENT, MORE DURABLE, MORE HANDSOME,
MORE SATISFACTORY,
IF YOU PAID FOUR TIMES THE PRICE WE ASK FOR IT.

27,000 physicians and 1,000,000 happy users recommend our Cabinet in the highest and strongest terms.

We are the largest manufacturers of Bath Cabinets in the world. Our annual sales 300,000 Cabinets. Value $1,500,000.00. Hundred times more than all other firms.

IT IS THE ONLY GENUINE CABINET MADE.

HAS A REAL DOOR, opens wide—hinged to frame. Other Cabinets with so-called door are simply a hole or slit to crawl through. FRAMEWORK strong and rigid, made of best steel, galvanized to prevent its rusting. EIGHT UPRIGHTS support it from top to bottom. Some affairs on the market have no supports whatever, Cabinet rests on shoulders—others have 2 or 3 flimsy supports, shaky and unsatisfactory. DURABLE COVERING MATERIAL, very best, antiseptic cloth—RUBBER LINED. TOP CURTAINS open on top for cooling off—Cabinets that do not do this are said to be dangerous. LARGE and ROOMY INSIDE. Knees, arms and body do not touch the sides. Plenty of room for hot foot bath, and to sponge, towel and cool the body while inside. FOLDS FLAT like a screen in 1 inch space—others crush together and damage the goods. WEIGHS complete only 10 lbs. Easily carried.

There is no Man, Woman or Child in the World Whom Turkish and Vapor Cabinet Baths will not Benefit.

Seated on a chair (with the head outside breathing pure air) one enjoys at home, for 3c each, all of the cleansing, curative, invigorating and purifying effects of the famous Turkish, Hot Air and Vapor baths, perfumed or medicated if desired. Better and cheaper than any treatment at Turkish Bath Rooms, Sanitariums and Hot Springs.

SO SIMPLE TO OPERATE.

Before retiring, light stove, step in Cabinet, close and lock door, sit down and you enjoy a temperature of 100° to 150° F. according to how you regulate stove. All done in one minute Stay in 15 to 30 minutes—open top curtains, cool off gradually while you sponge and towel the body. Impossible to catch cold or weaken the system. Perfectly safe and harmless.

DON'T BE DECEIVED

by imitations. We do not make it our business to find fault with other people's goods, but as there are a number of unreliable, irresponsible concerns who have sprung up in the past few months, know nothing whatever of the laws of hygiene, and have no regard for the public health, are trying to market so-called Cabinets which are inconvenient, unreliable and dangerous to use, on the strength of satisfaction given, and the enormous demand created for our genuine Quaker, and as we have many letters from persons who have bought such goods, are unable to use them, and obliged to throw them away and secure a genuine Cabinet from us, we feel it our duty to warn the public so that no one else may be imposed upon.

If our Cabinet is not the best in every way we do not want you to keep it.

Don't use a Cabinet which has no door, no frame, no rubber lining.

Remember a wooden frame Cabinet is ten years behind the times, is worthless, and ABOUT AS VALUABLE AS A WOODEN STOVE WOULD BE. Do not pay $7.50, $12 50 or $18.00 for inferior, bunglesome and inconvenient affairs when the best costs only $5 00.

Place your order with us and you have the satisfaction of knowing you are doing business with a responsible and reliable firm (capital $100,000.00) who know the requirements of a first-class Cabinet, do exactly as they agree and furnish you a genuine Cabinet, guaranteed to be the best in every particular.

Write to-day for full information and our valuable book, also testimonials from thousands of customers. Or, better still, order a Cabinet. You wont be deceived or disappointed as we guarantee every one, and refund your money after 30 days use if not just as represented. THE MESSAGE OF MALACHI.*

The Book of Malachi, though occupying the last place in the canon of the Old Testament, is certainly not the latest in point of time, for the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah date from a subsequent period, to say nothing of books which, like Malachi, belong to the list of prophetic writings. But in the uncertainty as to the date of such books as Joel and Jonah it was no doubt deemed better to place Malachi last, since it had definite reference to a late situation in the life of the chosen people and afforded an appropriate word with which to close the Old Testament.

The book itself is apparantly anonymous. It is scarcely likely that Malachi is a proper name. The word means "my messenger" and occurs in 3:1, from which fact it is not improbable that the book itself, which bore no name, was given the title suggested by an important word in its contents. The period at which the book was written was either late in the depressing days preceding the reform inaugurated by Nehemiah and Ezra, or possibly in the period between the first and second visits of the former to Jerusalem. Somewhere between 445 and 390 B. C., therefore, may be suggested as the date of this writing.

The situation is sufficiently clear as disclosed in the words of this book. The temple had been rebuilt back in the days of Haggai and Zechariah and its services were going on without interruption, but the condition of Judah was anything but prosperous. The people were for the most part poor and the prospects of the province were far from encouraging. A corresponding falling off in religious zeal was apparent. Both people and priest were impressed with the uselessness of the sanctuary services and were, therefore, offering gifts at the altar which were imperfect in character and an insult to Jehovah. The book opens with an expression of the popular feeling regarding the attitude of God toward the Jews. Men were sceptical of the divine assurance that God loved his people. They attributed their lack of success to abandonment by him. The prophet hastens to affirm that their troubles are the result of their own indifference to the divine service. The priests are first held to account for this state of affairs. They are charged with despising the divine name, and when in apparent astonishment they ask in what way this is shown to be the case, the reply is that polluted bread is offered upon the divine altar. They have accepted as offerings from the people sacrificial animals, which instead of being perfect as required by the law, (Deut. 15:21; 17:1; Lev. 22:19-24) are blind, lame and sick. In other words, they felt that it was a fine stroke of policy to use up at the sanctuary those beasts which were worthless for any other purpose. But this was a direct insult to the sacred place and to God. The prophet challenges them to present such gifts as these to their Persian Governor and see how he would be pleased. He would deem it an outrage upon his dignity and would resent it accordingly; and yet, they have no hesitancy in making such offerings to God as they would be ashamed to present to a provincial officer. How can they expect to be prospered of their divine Governor? The indignation of the prophet reaches its height in 2:10 where, speaking for God, he exclaims that it would be far better if some one would close the door of the temple entirely, that the sacrifices might not be offered in vain. There was no divine pleasure in them and such offerings were but an aggravation of the guilt of the people already too great.

In contrast with this attitude of the Jewish people, who are bringing reproach upon the name of their God, was that of the surrounding Gentile nations. The events of Israel's history had produced a strong impression upon the minds of the heathen. The Egyptians, the Canaanites, the Asyrians and Babylonians, as well as the Persians, and had been impressed by the power of this great God, whose people had been safeguarded in so many dangers; and already from these nations men were seeking the true faith as they sought it in still greater numbers in later days. It is not a prediction that Jehovah's name is sometime to be great among the nations, but it is a statement that it was actually so at that time. In contrast with the honor which unknown and heathen people show to the God of Israel is the dishonor which his own people manifest toward the temple which is his holy place. Verse 12 ff. should be read in close connection with 11 as affording the contrast between the faith of heathen nations and the unbelief and indifference of the Jew.

But this was not the only sin of the priests, for in the verses which intervene between the two sections of the present lesson there are other matters specified. The priests are charged with being unfaithful, not only to the divine commandments, but to the traditions of their order. They were intended to be religious teachers and to instruct the people in the way of God, but they have not only been unfaithful in this function, but their example has been actually subversive of all right conduct on the part of the nation. Another sin of which not only the priests but the people had been guilty was that of marrying strange wives, and this is emphasized as a sin against Jehovah, in that these foreign women are the daughters of strange gods and bring in their worship as a defilement of the sacred people. Once more: divorce was a growing evil among the Jews of this period, and possibly this was fostered by the desire on the part of some to put away their Jewish wives and marry these women from the neighboring nations. This also is denounced. In view of all this laxity in religious and civic life there is the threat that Jehovah will send his messenger who shall suddenly come to his temple as a reforming agent and set things right with a strong hand. One wonders whether the prophet may not be speaking of the expected arrival or return of Nehemiah who, as we know, actually performed functions very similar to those specified in the early verses of the third chapter, where the sins of the people are pointed out, and their need of correction.

Then follows the closing section of our present study in which there is given the divine exhortation to bring the tithes and offerings into the sacred house and cease the sin of roobbing God. When the appointed services of the temple were either abandoned or limited by the failure of the people to provide for the support of the priestly ministries a sin was committed that could only be attoned for by a generous and full-hearted outpouring of that wealth which, though not great in the community, was sufficient to win the divine favor. The great lesson of free and generous giving, not only in those matters which are prescribed by the law, but in the free will gifts, is here emphasized, and this grace of giving is perceived to be as much a matter of concern in the Old Testament as in the New. The divine blessing is promised as a certainty to those who try the experiment of bringing all the tithes into the storehouse, for the people are assured that upon these conditions the windows of heaven will be opened and blessings poured out so that there shall not be room to receive them; their enemies shall be destroyed, their fields shall prosper, the times of trouble shall cease, and all nations shall congratulate the people of God because of the prosperity which they enjoy.

FREE KIDNEY CURE

Cures Every Disorder of the Kidneys, Lame Back, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Bladder Troubles, and Even the Hopeless Cases of Bright's Disease and Diabetes.

A Trial Case of this Remarkable Remedy Mailed Free to Every Sufferer Sending Name and Address.

Dear Sirs: I am a passenger engineer on the H. & T. C. R. R., and have been for twenty years. I have suffered with Kidney and Liver trouble for fifteen years. Before I commenced to take your remedy I had to lay off, and was not able to turn in bed or get up in the morning, but since taking Alkavis have not suffered with my Kidneys or

Mr. Chas. B. Brady, Hempstead, Texas.

Rheumatism, nor have I lost a day. Before taking your medicine I made application to join insurance orders, but was rejected on account of Kidney trouble, but six months after taking I was examined again and passed O. K. CHAS. B. BRADY.

Disorders of the Kidneys and Bladder cause Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Gravel, Pain in the Back, Bladder Disorders, difficult or too frequent passing water, Dropsy, etc. For these diseases a Positive Specific Cure is found in a new botanical discovery, the wonderful Kava-Kava Shrub, called by botanists, the piper methysticum, from the Ganges River, East India. It has the extraordinary record of 1,200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly on the Kidneys and cures by draining out of the Blood the poisonous Uric Acid, Urates, Lithates, etc , which cause the disease Hon. R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that in four weeks he was cured of Rheumatism, Kidney and Bladder disease, after ten years' suffering. His bladder trouble was so great he had to get up five to twelve times during the night. Hundreds of others, and many ladies, including Mrs. Sarah Castle, of Poestenkill, N. Y., and Mrs. L D Fegely, Lancaster, Ills., also testify to its wonderful curative powers in Kidney and other disorders peculiar to womanhood.

That you may judge of the value of this Great Discovery for yourself, we will send you one Large Case by mail Free, only asking that when cured yourself you will recommend it to others as it deserves. It is a Sure Specific Cure and can not fail. Address, The Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 403 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

The importance of this grace of giving is made prominent in the teaching of the New Testament. Among the churches which were planted by Paul he sought everywhere to enkindle zeal for benevolence, deeming it not alone vital to the furtherance of the gospel's purposes in that age so far as provision for the poor and especially for the church at Jerusalem was concerned, but as a nessary factor in a fully developed Christian life. He encouraged one church to give by the example of another and ranked the spirit of generous giving in the Christian along with faith and knowledge and love of the brethren, the leading graces of the Christian life. It is he who has left us those ringing words of exhortation to the churches of Philippi and Corinth, and who has preserved for us that precious gem from the words of the Master: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." There is no place where this grace may be more easily cultivated than among young Christians. Those who have grown older without cultivating generous and hearty interest in the financial concerns of the church may be beyond the reach of a full conversion to the work of Christ, but at least for the children there is hope, since the real joy of giving may be cultivated in their hearts, and is certain to grow up with them into a broad and large benevolence that shall transform the small offerings of the present day for missionary, benevolent and educational purposes into abundant provision for the spread of the kingdom of Christ in the days to come.

Apostolic Christianity.

BY W. J. LHAMON, Director.

The word apostle comes from the Greek word which means to send, and the word missionary comes from the Latin word which means to send. The primary thought in the phrase "apostolic Christianity" is that it is a sending and therefore a going Christianity; this is the primary thought also of the phrase "missionary Christianity." By derivation the words apostle and missionary may fairly be called synonyms.

But unfortunately we no longer use them as such. Other thoughts than the primary one of sending have come up to overshadow this. When nowadays we speak of apostolic Christianity we mean primitive Christianity, or the Christianity of the first century, or Christianity as distinguished from Roman Catholicism or denominationalism or some mediæval or modern departure from the primitive style of doctrine and polity.

This is all very well, and the distinctions indicated are necessary ones. But we wish to go back and insist through a paragraph or two upon the primary meaning of the word apostolic. In a large sense Jesus spent his life in making apostles, i. e., missionaries, of his innermost circle of disciples. After his resurrection he breathed on them and said: "Receive ye the Holy Spirit; as the Father hath sent me, even so I send you." It was after his resurrection also that he said to them: "Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." Thus they were constituted missionaries by one of the most sacred of symbolical acts, and one of the most emphatic of commandments.

In addition to this these first believers in Christ were constituted missionaries by force of circumstances. They now believed that Christ was the Son of God, and they were convinced that their lifelong loyalty was due to him. They must either falsely deny him or bravely confess him. As true men, filled with the Holy Spirit, they could not do the former; they must do the latter. But to confess him was to preach him, and to preach him was both to suffer persecution and to win believers—the common experiences of all true missionaries. Moreover, the apostles were like soldiers in the enemy's territory—they must either march and fight, or die in their tracks. Persecution thrust them out of Jerusalem, and "they went everywhere preaching the Word." What could be more apostolic or missionary than their primitive Christianity was, a persecuted and preaching power, moving outward as from the center to the circumference of a mighty circle. Beyond Jerusalem lay Judea, and beyond Judea Samaria, and beyond Samaria, "the uttermost parts of the earth."

Very soon Paul was chosen by the risen Christ, and thrust forth into the Gentile world, for Christianity must be a progressive and aggressive and conquering force or it is nothing. The whole Jewish world could not furnish a sphere of activity sufficient for the young church with her mighty truth, her majestic claims and her heroic deeds. Such a child cannot attain its majority within the bosom of a decadent mother. The apostle Paul's apostolicity consisted in precisely this, that he was a missionary, that he carried the sign of the cross, and the significance of it, deep as life, out into the promising Western world.

Within a generation the "good news" had made itself known and felt throughout the Roman world as a power that conquered and could not be crushed. This amazing fact is the proof positive, and all but exclusive of its apostolicity. The proof of a missionary religion is its missions rather than its philosophy, its theology or its polity. Likewise, the proof of an apostolic religion is its missions. The church that is wholly minus her missions is not apostolic, though her bishops push up their apostolical succession caps high as a church steeple. The church that has no missionary spirit is practically antimissionary, and therefore unapostolic. Sending and going and preachfng and teaching and winning and conquering all belong to the very spirit of Christ and his apostles, and all such action is primitive and apostolic and Christly. Anything short of it misses the mark.

the Rheumatic Cure demonstrated its wonderful curative power.

It has never failed to cure RHEUMATISM in any form, Acute or Chronic.

Here is what a Prominent Physician has to say who has had 35 years of active Practice of Medicine:

I have never before in my 35 years of practice of medicine given my testimonial or recommendation to any patent medicine, but there is a remedy, the result of which has come under my own observation; for there is no Disease which has so baffled the medical skill of all ages as Rheumatism and to find a Reliable remedy for the same. At last we have found it in "5 DROPS," manufactured by the Swanson Rheumatic Cure Company, Chicago, Ill.

The "5 DROPS," has proven itself wonderful for its curative power in Rheumatism, not as a Temporary Reliever only, but to give a Permanent Cure even in chronic cases. Sometime ago, I had among others several Rheumatic cases, under my treatment and prescribed for these patients the very best Remedies which I skillfully selected, but without desirable results. I then heard of "5 DROPS" and of its Wonderful Cures, and prescribed it to a few patients who found relief from its use within a few days. After that I prescribed it to a great number and to my surprise, I will say that in the course of Two or Three Weeks after they had used "5 DROPS" and "5 Drop" Plasters they were Cured.

Among these were a few who had, for a number of years, been suffering with Chronic Rheumatism, who had piloted themselves around on Crutches. They came to my office without Crutches and told me they were perfectly Well. They give all the credit to "5 DROPS" and to "5 Drop" Plasters and this is their testimony to the Swanson Rheumatic Cure Company for their kindness and for the conscientious way in which they are placing these Wonderful Remedies among suffering humanity, which they told me to write to the Company as an acknowledgement.

As I have seen the Curative Power of "5 DROPS" and "5 Drop" Plasters, in a great many instances, I can Truly recommend them and also that the firm is perfectly honest and reliable to deal with. C. A. JACKSON, Physician and Surgeon, Kearney, Neb., Aug. 29, 1899.

How Long Have You Suffered with RHEUMATISM?
How Long Have You Read About "5 DROPS" Without Taking Them?

Do you not think you have wasted precious time and suffered enough? If so, then try the "5 drops" and be promptly and permanently cured of your afflictions. "5 Drops" is a speedy and Sure Cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Sciatica, Lumbago (lame back), Kidney Diseases, Asthma, Hay-Fever, Dyspepsia, Catarrh of all kinds, Bronchitis, La Grippe, Headache, Nervous or Neuralgic, Heart Weakness, Dropsy, Earache, Spasmodic and Catarrhal Croup, Toothache, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Creeping Numbness, Malaria, and kindred diseases. "5 Drops" has cured more people, during the past four years, of the above named diseases than all other remedies known, and in case of Rheumatism is curing more than all the doctors, patent medicines, electric belts and batteries combined, for they cannot cure Chronic Rheumatism. Therefore, waste no more valuable time and money longer, but try "5 Drops" and be promptly CURED. "5 Drops" is not only the best medicine, but it is the cheapest, for a $1.00 bottle contains 300 doses. Price per bottle $1.00, prepaid by mail or express, or 6 bottles for $5.00. For the next 30 days we will send a 25c. sample FREE to any one sending 10 cents to pay for the mailing. Agents wanted. Literature.

SOME LATTER-DAY RELIGIONS. By George Hamilton Combs. Chicago, New York, Toronto. Fleming H. Revell Company. 1899.

The last quarter of this century has been marked, not only by substantial progress in art, in science and in biblical learning, but by the springing up of certain more or less popular cults which have been made substitutes for Christianity. These are designated in the above volume as "Latter day Religions." In this classification the author places I. Æstheticism; II. Theosophy; III. Otherism; IV. Faith Cure; V. Pessimism; VI. Pessimism (continued); VII. Agnosticism; VIII. Materialism; IX. Spiritualism; X. Liberalism; XI. Mormonism; XII. Christian Science; XIII. Socialism. And these constitute the several chapters of the book, making in all a handsome volume of 261 pages.

To understand the conditions out of which these "religions" have arisen, to separate the chaff from what little wheat they may contain, to characterize their crudities in terms sufficiently strong to make their real nature apparent and yet remain within parliamentary limitations, and through all this to exalt the living Christ and his living Word, as the only satisfying portion of the soul—this requires both a well-balanced mind, a discriminating judgment and a disciplined pen. When we say that the author seems to us to have met these conditions in a most satisfactory way, we have paid him and his book the highest compliment in our power.

We read a considerable portion of the MS. of this volume, and strongly urged its publication. We believe its sale and the good it shall accomplish in fortifying the minds of believers against these more or less plausible attempts to draw men away into vain and unprofitable speculations will abundantly justify our recommendation.

Mr. Combs is the master of a very chaste and lucid style, and in reading after him one not only feels satisfied with what he says, but charmed with his manner of saying it. What can be more exquisite than this description of pessimism:

Pessimism makes no account of the world beauty, world glory. Earth's tender skies, fruitful valleys, resounding seas, morning freshness, evening stillness, scents of meadows and songs of birds are as nothing to our mental dyspeptic. He cares not for these. For him there is no entrancing mystery gathering around the high mountain, no music in the waterfall, no hint of love in flower or star. It is all in vain that snow crystals build up their wondrous piles, that clouds are mantled with crimson and scarlet, that trees wave their banners of green, that plains break into the tumultuous beauty of flowers. In a world of beauty he has no eyes; in a world of melody he has no ears. Earth's stupendous miracles he regards not, nor all its sweet surprises. He holds the world common and cheap, its beauties as worthless things. Nor does physical life, life as life, appeal to him. The joys of the senses are cheats. Of the sensuous happiness of the Greeks he knows nothing. To be open to all that flows in upon him through the senses exalting, enrapturing, entrancing, is nothing. His is ever the Oriental refrain: Life is a burden.—Pages 112, 113.

The book will be found both a mental and moral tonic, as well as a prophylactic against these modern forms of unbelief. Hence we wish and predict for it a popular demand and wide usefulness.

A Vest Pocket Commentary on the International Sunday-school Lessons for 1900, by DeLoss M. Tompkins, D. D., published by Fred D. Ewell, 132 Market Street, Chicago. Art linen, 25 cts., full morocco, gilt edges, 35 cts., interleaved edition, ruled for pencil notes, 50 cts. This little volume presents in a most convenient form the lesson for the entire year, together with a remarkable amount of comprehensive study helps. It is truly a "pocket companion," enabling one to always have material for study at hand. To utilize the odd moments is its aim.

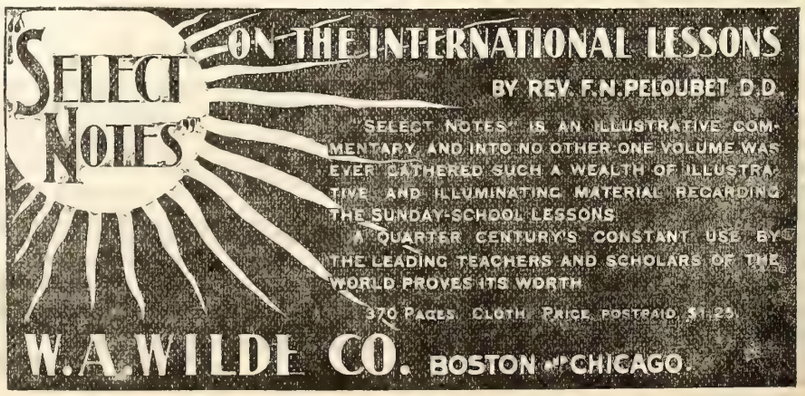
DECEMBER MAGAZINES.

Self Culture for December is one of the best numbers we have yet seen of this increasingly popular magazine. The illustrated articles are fine and deeply interesting, especially those on the "Death of Washington," "Our Spanish-American Fellow Citizens," "Mound-Builders of Ohio," "Yuletide Customs," "Colonial Life in New England," etc.

The present successor to Henry Ward Beecher in the pulpit of Plymouth church, Brooklyn, Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, is preaching to vast congregations through his contributions to the press. During the coming year the readers of the Woman's Home Companion will be included in his literary fold, with an able discussion from his pen of "The Revival of Art and Beauty," to appear in the January Woman's Home Companion.

As might be expected, the Christmas spirit pervades the December St. Nicholas. "The Children Danced Around It" is the frontispiece, and this refers, of course, to a Christmas tree—one that was used afterwards as the mast of a ship, a bear's cave, and all sorts of things that grown folks would never have thought a Christmas tree fit for. Short stories, verses and pictures crowd each other in the teeming pages, and will not be diminished in size during the coming year.

The Christmas number of Scribner's this year contains several striking novelties in illustration. The methods are not only new, but the results are in every way artistic. Walter Appleton Clark's pictures, which accompany Harrison Morris's Ballad of Three Kings, are rich in color as an old stained-glass window. The original pictures have been reproduced with absolute fidelity, so that there are none of the violent contrasts of color so often seen when a painting is reproduced by modern processes of printing.



In the December number of the American Monthly Review of Reviews there is an editorial summary of the results of the elections, with a discussion of their import as an indorsement of the administration's policy. The editor also describes the progress of the Philippine campaign, the war in South Africa, and many other matters of international interest.

The December "New Lippincott" breathes the Christmas spirit throughout. The complete novel by Ernest Rhys in the December "New Lippincott," under the striking title of "The Whistling Maid," is a romance of peculiar interest and weird beauty. It exhales the very breath of the Welsh land in which the scene is laid, and brings back the charm of love and martal glory which characterized the days of Celtic knighthood.

"Are We Nearing the End of the Age?" is the subject of an able article which opens the December number of the Missionary Review of the World. The writer, Dr. Pierson, considers in succession each of the principal means of computation, and reviews some of the main points advanced by various Bible students. While not dogmatically stating his conclusions, Dr. Pierson is inclined to believe that the signs of the times point to an approaching crisis.

Dr. O'Meara, author of the famous volumes "Napoleon at St. Helena," left a journal of his daily intercourse with Napoleon in exile, less than half of which was drawn upon in his published work. The original journal, containing upwards of 160,000 words, was bequeathed by Dr. O'Meara to a friend, by whose heirs it has been placed in the hands of the editors of the Century. It abounds in passages of the greatest interest, as bearing on the character and opinions of Napoleon, matter which was suppressed by Dr. O'Meara at the time of the publication of his book in 1822. This journal, which is distinct from the book manuscript, though the latter is in large measure founded upon it, is in a fuller and more intimate style, and details the life and conversation at Longwood without reserve. The Century Magazine will soon begin to publish copious extracts from this journal.

TEACHER'S LESSON HELP.

The Christian Lesson Commentary, published by the Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo. Price, $1.

Every Sunday-school teacher finds it of great advantage to have a lesson commentary of permanent value, and in this volume will be found the excellent qualities appreciated by teachers. The helps provided are selected from many sources, and they are of varied character. A preliminary preview is given, then the lesson text in self-pronouncing style, then a plain exposition, followed by illustrative matter and practical applications. A number of suggestive questions are also given. Its 390 pages are packed with information on the lessons for 1900, and every lesson is made clearer by the use of maps and illustrations. We have used the commentaries of this series during several years, and find them satisfactory. The issue for 1900 is the fourteenth. It is prepared by W. W. Dowling, a well-known and successful Sunday-school worker.—The Watchword, Dayton, O.

The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900, by the Rev. W. W. Dowling, is a complete and most valuable production. Editor Dowling brings large experience to his task and is able to illustrate the text as few can. The commentary is printed in clear type, on fine paper, and is richly illustrated. It is as pleasing to the eye as it is helpful to the head. It cannot fail to make the Bible student familiar with his lesson. Of all the lesson helps, the Lesson Commentary is surpassed in value by none, while it excels most of the helps in real value. Price, $1.—J. P. Watson, Herald of Gospel Liberty.

The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900, published by the Christian Pub. Co., St. Louis, Mo., is equal to any of the preceding volumes of this sterling Commentary. The author, W. W. Dowling, who has been the author of several preceding volumes, is a careful, conservative and yet progressive biblical exegete. None will be fed on speculative theories in the study of this book. It is intended for advanced pupils and teachers. It contains a careful analysis of each lesson, with introductory, geographical, explanatory, illustrative, applicatory and practical notes, with suggestions for teachers and pupils on each lesson. The price, single copy, bound in cloth, by mail, is $1; per dozen, not prepaid, $9 —Pacific Christian, San Francisco, Cal.

HOSFELDT.

Meta May, daughter of J. G. and Ellen Hosfeldt, Lexington, Mo., aged 23, of consumption. Deceased was of a lovable Christian character. Wherever she had gone as teacher or in search of health, whether to Georgia, Texas, or Colorado Springs, Colo., her love, gentleness and Christian faithfulness caused her to be loved. Her church, home and community have a rich heritage in the faith and strength of her closing days. Truly, she also for her Savior "did what she could" in living and in dying. E. J. FENSTENMACHER.

KELLER.

Elder J. W. Kellar, one of the oldest and best known citizens of Henry County, died at his residence in Montrose, Missouri, September 5, 1899. He was born in Jefferson County, Kentucky, January 9, 1819, and at 12 years of age came with his parents to Illinois. In 1842 he was married to Miss Sarah Birch, of Edgar County, Illinois, and formerly of England. To this happy union were born eight children, five of whom have preceded him to the spirit world. In 1869 Bro. Kellar and family moved to Bates County, Missouri, and later to Henry County, Missouri. Death having bereft him of his companion on May 23, 1874, he was on August 5, 1875, married to Miss Lucy A. Gates, of Henry County, Missouri. At the age of 21 Bro. Kellar joined the Christian Church and was baptized in Harod's Creek, Kentucky, by Elder Pinkerton. For 60 years he was an earnest and devoted minister of the gospel of Christ. His broad, catholic spirit and manifest devotion to the truth lifted him above all those things that separate us and made us feel that in him we had a brother. His ministerial labors throughout Illinois, Kansas and Missouri and the multitude of friends that he had among all denominations, bear record that he was no ordinary man. Bro. Kellar's life was in many respects a very exemplary one. Being a man of some means, he had contributed liberally to the churches and colleges and to all kinds of charitable institutions. Not only so, but in addition to all this, he was not only kind, but also liberal to the poor at his own door. Like the great Wesley he could say, "My hands have been my executors." He had for some time been conscious that he was fast failing and that the end was drawing nigh. In all this he was resigned to the will of his Heavenly Father. During this last sickness he told his wife to be prepared, for this might be his last. It was only too true. Medical aid could no longer avail and a higher power took him. He leaves a wife, three children and a host of relatives and friends to mourn his loss, but he leaves the greatest assurance that all is well with him. Among his last words she repeated from memory that grand old hymn, "A home in heaven, what a joyful thought!" On September 7, 1899, the funeral services were conducted by the writer at Johnston, Missouri, in the presence of a large concourse of sorrowing relatives and friends. The remains were then interred in the Johnstown cemetery, with the honors of the Masonic fraternity, of which he had been for fifty years an honored member. Hundreds will rise up in that day to call him blessed. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they rest form their labors, and their works do follow them."—R. M. NEALE.

LOWTHER.

J. W. Lowther was born in Henry County, Tenn., July 20, 1870. He united with the Christian Church at the age of 21 He died at his brother's in St. Louis, Mo , Nov. 18, 1899. A kind, loving son and brother has been called on before. Funeral services were conducted by the writer Nov. 19, 1899, after which his body was laid to rest in Bellefontaine.
W. F. HAMANN.

WEBB.

Sarah A Ferney was born in Pittsylvania county, Va., July 4, 1820. She was united in marriage Sept. 12, 1839, to James T. Webb. Having lived in Leatherwood, Henry county, Va., until the year 1841, they moved to St. Charles county, Mo., and located a few miles south of Foristell. At this home, made so peaceful and bright by her congenial spirit, she fell asleep in the triumph of a living faith, Nov 16, 1899. Sister Webb confessed her faith in Christ at the old Hickory Grove Church, three miles south of Foristell, but when the church was built in Foristell she changed her membership to that place, becoming a charter member of that congregation. Humbly and unassumingly she lived the life of a true Christian. "Father Webb," who is still an elder of the Foristell Church, with the sons and daughters who mourn her loss, have our sincere sympathy, and we are glad to share with them in the hope of the immortality of the soul and a glorious resurrection. CHRISTIAN - EVANGELIST FOR 1900

It is purposed to make the closing volume of the "Christian-Evangelist," for the Century, a crowning one in its history. Following is a partial announcement of things in store for our readers the coming year:

EDITORIAL.

This department will deal with the leading events in the current history of the world, and will discuss vital religious themes, including a series of editorials on "THE MESSAGE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY TO THE TWENTIETH." The editor will be assisted by W. W. Hopkins and by Prof. W. E. Garrison. The usual editorial features—"Current Events," "Current Religious Thought," "Editor's Easy Chair," "Hour of Prayer" and "Questions and Answers," will be maintained.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

The Sunday-school articles for the coming year will be prepared by our well-known correspondent, W. F. RICHARDSON. These lessons will follow the life of Christ through the entire year. Bro. Richardson will have a national, not to say international Bible Class. Will you join it?

FROM THE CITIES

1. W. Durban, of London, will continue ENGLISH TOPICS, and these, for the next year, are likely to be of unusual interest.

2. S. T. Willis will keep our readers informed of what is going on in the metropolis of the New World, writing of men and movements which come into prominence in Greater New York.

3. E. B. Bagby, our Washington correspondent, will write on such topics as "The Opening Day of Congress," "A White House Reception," "Experiences of a Chaplain in the House of Representatives," "A Day in Mount Vernon," "Washington as a Literary Center," etc.

4. B. B. Tyler, the celebrated Letter Writer, will furnish our readers a weekly letter during 1900, writing from the shadow of Pike's Peak for awhile, and then, perhaps, from the shadow of the University of Chicago, but always with his pen dipped in sunshine.

These are only a few of our leading correspondents. Others will be announced later.

ORIGINAL CONTRIBUTORS.

This department will receive special prominence the coming year, as witness the following:

W. T. MOORE:

1. "Some of Our Pressing Needs."
2. "Importance of Our Religious Position."
3. "Our Evangelistic Methods—Can They Be Improved?"
4. "Is Preaching an Art?"
5. "Value of Individual Liberty in the Christian Life."
6. "Stereoperfunctity and What to Do With it."
7. "The Money Question and How to Solve it."
8. "Retrospection—A Look Over the Past Century."
9. "Present Theological Tendencies."
10. "How to Distinguish Between Essentials and Non-Essentials."
11. "The Lord's Day Service—Can it Be Improved?"
12. "Some Fundamental Principles in Criticism."

A. B. PHILPUTT:

1. "Lights and Shadows of a Preacher's Life."
2. "What Should a Young Man Preparing for the Ministry Study?"
3. "The Preacher in His Study."
4. "The Preacher in the Pulpit."
5. "The Preacher in the Homes of the People."
6. "Recollections of Some Noted Preachers."
7. "Proper Conduct of Public Worship."
8. "Is There a Tendency to Over-Organization in Our Churches?"
9. "Different Types of Preachers and Their Value."
10. "Ministerial Courtesy."

PROF. H. L. WILLETT:

1. "Some Leading Biblical and Theological Teachers in Europe." (A series of articles.)
2. "The Bible and the Monuments."
3. "Recent Research in Bible Lands."

A. B. JONES:

CURRENT EVENTS.

The overwhelming defeat of the Hardwick bill for the disfranchisement of the negro in Georgia comes as a glad surprise to the Northern public. A similar measure had become law so easily in Mississippi, and in Louisiana a constitutional amendment of the same import had been passed with so little effective opposition, that it was taken for granted that the thing would be accomplished quite generally in the Southern states. The bill submitted to the Georgia Legislature contained two important provisions: (1) that the right to vote should be conditioned upon ability to read and understand any part of the constitution; (2) that this test should not be applied to any person, or lineal descendants of any person, who voted prior to Jan. 1, 1867. The first provision, on its surface, excludes all the illiterate, both white and black. The second, the famous "grandfather clause," which is found also in the Louisiana and Mississippi laws, narrows this to the exclusion of illiterate blacks. This is bad enough, but the Georgia bill goes beyond the laws of the other two states mentioned. Not only are illiterate whites admitted to the polls, but by the "and understand" phrase it becomes possible for partisan judges to deprive even educated negroes of the rights of citizenship. What rigid rule can be applied to tell whether a man understands what he reads? Take a passage like Art. III., Sec. III., clause 3 of the Federal Constitution: "no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted." In any community of average intelligence, probably half of the voters could be thrown out if judges should choose this clause and demand a clear definition of "attainder," "corruption of blood" and "forfeiture." Every state constitution contains passages which would serve the purpose equally well. In short, the Hardwick bill proposed the enfranchisement of all whites and the disfranchisement of all negroes, without respect to educational qualifications. The defeat of the bill by a vote of 137 to 3 is a gratifying illustration of the power of public opinion on the right side and an evidence that Georgia, in spite of her unsavory reputation for lynching, is more fit for self government than some other states that could be mentioned.

Chief among Emperor William's plans for the advancement of Germany as a world-power is his plan for the increase of his navy. From the beginning of his reign he has urged naval appropriations and, although he has met constant opposition in the Reichstag, he has in the comparatively few years of his sovereignty brought about a notable improvement in the German navy. Two years ago, after much urging by the emperor, a naval appropriation of nearly $100,000,000 was voted on the condition that no further appropriation for increase of the navy should be asked for within six years. It was believed at that time that $15,000,000 a year would be ample for this purpose. But events have moved rapidly since 1897 and the emperor's ideas of his naval necessities have grown. The United States has apparently entered the field of international politics on a par with the foremost European nations. Great Britain's war in South Africa has introduced a new element of uncertainty into European politics. The rise of Japan as a power in the Orient suggests increased armament in view of possible emergencies in that quarter. In general the kaiser thinks that if there is to be war Germany should be better prepared for it; and, if the powers are entering upon a period of arbitration and alliance, German friendship will be more prized if German hostility is made more dangerous. In spite of the "six years'" provision which accompanied the appropriation of 1897, a new bill will be introduced into the present Reichstag for an appropriation of about $400,000,000, spread over a period of seventeen years. The immediate effect of this will be more important for German domestic politics than for her prestige among the nations. The Roman Catholic party holds the balance of power between the Conservatives and moderate Liberals, who will support the measure, and Richter Liberals and Socialists who may be counted on to oppose it. The most probable outcome is that an attempt will be made by the clerical party to secure the removal of the constitutional Catholic disabilities as the price of its support of the naval appropriation bill. By this circumstance the curious situation is obtained, that the fortunes of the German navy and of the Roman Catholic Church in Germany are bound together. And it is this fact which makes it evident that the outcome of this contest for naval expansion will have more immediate bearing on the German constitution than on her position as a world-power.

The Currency Bill, which was drafted by the committee of eleven from the Republican caucus, has been presented in the House of Representatives. The debate upon it began on Monday, Dec. 11, and the following Monday was agreed upon as the date for the vote. Even a casual examination of the bill reveals the fact that it was constructed, not with a view of remedying all the defects of our present monetary system, or introducing all the reforms which the members of the committee think might be desirable, but with a view to presenting a scheme which would do some good and would stand some chance of passing the two Houses of Congress. Accordingly, it is a conservative measure, containing as few points as possible which are likely to provoke vexatious arguments and consequent delay. Its chief points are as follows: (1) It definitely and explicitly establishes the gold standard. (2) It provides that greenbacks when once redeemed in gold shall not be issued again except in exchange for gold, thus putting a stop to the "endless chain" process of exhausting the gold reserve. (3) It authorizes national banks to issue notes up to the full par value of the bonds deposited by them. (4) It permits the organization of national banks with a capital of $25,000 in towns of less than 2,000.

It cannot be said that the war in the Philippines is over yet, nor even that an absolute cessation of hostilities is immediately in sight. The army has conducted a phenomenal campaign during the past few weeks and met with unqualified success whenever it has been able to come in contact with the enemy. Aguinaldo is a fugitive, his whereabouts unknown and his army disintegrated. Prisoners have been taken by the hundreds and many Spanish prisoners have been captured along with their Filipino captors. Vast numbers of natives, including some who had been prominent in the insurrection, have submitted to the authority of the United States and expressed their satisfaction at the approaching end of the old regime. Nevertheless, the end of the old regime is only approaching; it is not here. There are several groups of perhaps a thousand insurgents each in various parts of the island and there seems to be no immediate way of getting at them. After a prolonged silence, Gen. Young has made known his whereabouts and the result of his campaign, which turns out to have been on the whole rather the most busy, brilliant and successful part of the whole affair. If present indications count for anything it will not be possible to make the Philippine war an issue in next year's presidential campaign; by that time it will not exist.

The British have met with unexpected reverses in their South African campaign. On last Saturday Gen. Gatacre attempted to take Stormberg, but was defeated with a loss of 670 officers and men and one gun. Gen. Gatacre seems to have been misinformed by his guides as to the location and strength of the Boers about Stormberg, and was led into ground from which he was compelled to retreat with the result stated. The effect of this defeat, it is thought, will have a great influence upon the Dutch in Cape Colony by way of increasing their Boer sympathies and assistance. It seems also to have checked the general movement against the Boers at Ladysmith and Kimberly. Gen. Methuen is reported convalescing from the wound received at Modder River, but he seems unable to push through Gen. Cronje's rank to Kimberly without another big battle. The defeat of Gen. Gatacre greatly increases the seriousness of the situation for the British in Africa and it now seems that no great headway can be made until there is a further increase of British arms.

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR THE CHURCHES.

We call special attention to the offer made elsewhere in this paper entitled "Club Rates For Churches." This offer is made to meet a want that is felt by a large number of churches whose pastors and officers feel that a good religious journal in the homes of their people would do more to advance their spiritual interests and those of the cause than any other one agency. These churches have written us to know what can be done to assist them in this work. They recognize the fact that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is published at as low a price as it can be furnished for and maintain its present standard of excellence, but they wish to know if by their co-operation with us in extending the list, in which the churches become our agents and by which we minimize the amount of extra work involved by sending these extra copies to one address, we cannot afford to make a reduction. We have agreed to meet this request as indicated in this special offer, by which it is possible for the average church to supply its membership with the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST at small cost. It is expected, of course, that the churches will collect from the members receiving the paper a price not less than that which they pay, for they will thereby better appreciate the paper.

It would not be fair to disturb the existing lists of subscribers at any place by this offer. These will probably prefer to receive the paper directly from this office as at present. The plan is to supply the paper to those who do not read it.

It should be understood also that this is a special offer for the coming year and is in the nature of an experiment. It remains for the churches to demonstrate its practicability. We have made the offer. Will the churches now avail themselves of it?

A few churches are awaking to the great value of a good religious journal in the homes of their members, and have written us for some special rate; but it is against our principle to offer a rate to any one church that we do not offer to all churches. For this reason we have published the offer in our columns, that every church desiring to do so may avail itself of its benefits and increase the circulation of the CHRISTIAN - EVANGELIST among its members.

It is believed by many that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has a special message and mission for these times, and that its wide circulation among our churches will stimulate thought, create new enthusiasm for the cause we plead, foster a wider charity, increase interest in all our general enterprises and cultivate a deeper religious life in our members. We have a right to expect the hearty co-operation of all our readers who feel this way about the paper, and we assure them of our steadfast purpose, as far as in us lies, to work for these great ends. What do the churches say? We shall be glad to receive a postal card from every one who feels any special interest in this offer.

THE "OPEN DOOR" POLICY.

We hear and see a good deal these days about the "open door" policy in reference to China. England and the various continental powers have been gradually acquiring what is euphemistically called "Spheres of Influence" in the Celestial Empire. They have partitioned up China among themselves so far as these spheres of influence are concerned without so much as consulting China's wish in the matter. It is reported through the daily press that our government has recently been questioning these various European powers as to whether it is their intention to maintain the "open door" policy in commerce within their respective spheres of influence, or whether the United States is to be deprived of its part of the trade of this great Oriental Empire that is just awaking from the slumber of ages. We are told that the response to this question from all the European powers has been favorable. This is certainly very gratifying from a commercial point of view, and it suggests the interesting inquiry as to what effect this "open door" policy in the Orient is destined to have on the tariff question at home. But to pursue that subject would be to verge on the danger line in politics, and the object of this article is not political, but intellectual and religious.

If the "open door" policy is a good thing in commerce, would it not be a good thing also in the realm of thought and of religion? A nation is said to be a "hermit nation" when it closes its ports to the commerce of the world and regards irself as independent of any assistance or co-operation with other nations. Are there not hermit minds that are hermetically sealed against new ideas? To say the very least, there are some who place a very high tariff on a new thought, and in many cases it becomes prohibitive. We believe it to be a good thing for an individual to keep his ports open for intellectual commerce with his fellowmen.

The "open door" policy in China or in any other country is based on the idea that these countries have needs which other nations can supply, and that they have supplies also which other nations need. It is this reciprocity between supply and demand that makes up trade and commerce. No one country is able to produce everything which its people need, however diversified its soil or climate may be. No one mind is capable of generating all the new ideas, and of discovering all the truth which wi be found necessary to its largest develop ment. It is by contact with other mind and by its "open door" policy in receivin new ideas from them that it makes healthful and normal growth.

We believe the "open door" policy to b a good one for religious journals. The effo to maintain such a policy is sometime accompanied with friction, as we hav learned in the course of our experience but we believe, nevertheless, that it is th only safe and rational policy for any jour nal to pursue, whether religious or politi cal. We have tried to make a free plat form in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST o which men who have ideas may presen them without fear of editorial excommuni cation. This has been a characteristi feature of religious journalism among th Disciples of Christ from the beginning They have always been willing to hea both sides of every question. The alarn which has been manifested at times, of late because of the presentation of differing views, is a modern development and is no characteristic of our religious movement We have always favored the "open door' policy. Our papers have said to the repre sentatives of every creed in Christendom "If you have any truth which we ought t have and have not, you are welcome t state it in our columns." We have no often received such hospitality at the hands of our religious neighbors.

Of course, there is a limitation to the "open door" policy, even in commerce. China tried to exclude England's opium, but was defeated. There are certain things that every civilized nation on earth ought to exclude from its borders. There are certain kinds of books and pictures which, on account of their infamous character, are not entitled to the benefit of the "open door" policy. We exclude many things from the columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST because we think their influence would be bad or because we do not think them worthy of the space. Every man ought to shut the door of his mind against all unclean thoughts and unholy desires. But this is not contrary to the policy of the open door. It is simply avoiding the abuse of it. In the realm of pure thoughts, of new ideas, of larger visions of truth and duty, of new inspiration to sacrifice and toil, we do well to maintain the "open door" policy.

EVANGELISTS AND EVANGELISM.

THIRD PAPER.

Teaching and preaching, in scriptural evangelism, go hand in hand. The preaching should be instructive. The tendency of the instruction should be to bring men to a decision for Christ. God hath joined these two together in his Word. Let no man dare to separate them.

This union of the teaching with the public proclamation of the good news gave success—real success—to the work of our fathers. They were evangelists. They were also teachers. When they preached they taught. The people heard them because they received instruction. It is true that those whom we fondly call "the fathers" did not bring persons into the fellowship of the church with such rapidity as is characteristic of our work, at the present time; but who will say that those whom they turned to the Lord were not better instructed in the Scriptures and more stable in their characters than are our converts. Their preaching and teaching, it is believed, reached and influenced, upon the whole, a more intelligent class. Looking impartially at their work, there may be reasons for fear that they addressed themselves too exclusively to those who were able to think. "The fathers" were not infallible, nor are their sons. The former strove earnestly and with all diligence to ascertain the teaching of the Word that they might conform to it in their lives and that they might prevail on others to do the same. In this respect their sons will do well to imitate them. "To the law and to the testimony." What is the teaching of the Word on evangelists and evangelism?

There is no room for doubt that in the work of making disciples and teaching them, Paul desired the ministers of the church at Ephesus to do as they had seen him do. He would have them walk in his footsteps. He said to them at Miletus: "I have given you an example."

In the charge to Timothy Paul said: "Do the work of an evangelist;" and, "the things which thou has heard from me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to FAITHFUL men, who shall be able to TEACH others." Paul taught and trained Timothy by word and example: Timothy was to render the same character of service to others. In this way the good news was to be spread abroad.

The evangelist in the Apostolic Church possessed authority; in the church of the present time he does not possess authority.

Paul was an evangelist; but he was more. Timothy was and evangelist and a bishop. The evangelist in the primitive church possessed and exercised episcopal authority. The "Pastor-Evangelist," to use again the words of Geo. F. Hall at the Jubilee Convention, is the only kind of evangelist recognized in the New Testament.

Timothy was left, in Ephesus by Paul, with the injunction to "charge certain men not to teach a different doctrine" from that which they had received from him, "neither to give heed to fables and endless genealogies, the which minister questions rather than a dispensation of God which is in faith." The words, "charge certain men," indicate AUTHORITY. After mentioning a number of items upon which he would have Timothy to speak he says: "If thou put the brethren in mind of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ;" and then adds: "These things COMMAND and teach." The word "command" indicates AUTHORITY. "Let no man," he says, "despise thy youth." Bear yourself, in other words, in such a manner as to compel respect. "Be thou an example to them that believe, in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity." This is the instruction given by a man possessing AUTHORITY from Jesus Christ our Lord to one who was told to "do the work of an evangelist."

The AUTHORITY of an evangelist in the churches of the saints, in the days of the holy apostles, was that of character—but there was more than this—or there was an AUTHORITY other than that which inheres in a godly character. There was OFFICIAL AUTHORITY which the evangelist possessed. The following words indicate OFFICIAL AUTHORITY: "Against an elder receive not an accusation except at the mouth of two or three witnesses. Them that sin reprove in the sight of all, that the rest also may be in fear. Lay hands hastily on man, neither be partaker of other men's sins. Rebuke not an elder, but exhort him as a father. Reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering."

It must, from the foregoing, be apparent to all that Paul expected Timothy, as an evangelist, to exercise OFFICAL AUTHORITY in his administration of the affairs of the church. Such a man, to use the language S. M. Martin, quoted in a previous paper, is not "literally drawn into the engagement." This kind of an evangelist, the New Testament kind, does not simply "go when he is sent for." It is as certain as certainty itself that Timothy was not that kind of an evangelist. He possessed OFFICIAL AUTHORITY. He had a right to go where he was sent for. It was not infrequently his duty to do so.

Similar conclusions are to be drawn from the Epistle of Paul to Titus.

But of this in a subsequent paper.

Hour of Prayer.

GOOD TIDINGS OF GREAT JOY.

(Luke 2:8-20; Matt. 2:7-12.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Dec. 20th.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: The birth of the Christ-child was good news for the whole world and the greatest event in the history of time. The wise men from the East, who visited His cradle, were but the advance couriers of a mighty procession which, in all successive ages, has come to offer incense at His shrine.

God's ways are not man's ways. Man would have arranged a different setting for the greatest event in the world's history. A King is to be born into the world who is to rise to universal dominion. He is to be the Son of the Most High; and yet, he was born in a manger because there was no room for them at the inn. A group of humble shepherds abiding in the field near by and keeping watch by night over their flocks are the first to hear the wonderful tidings of the new-born King. We would have selected a palace for His birthplace, and we would have had the announcement made to kings and nobles. But God's nobility is not always man's nobility.

And yet, the scene was magnificent. We can in our imagination draw its outlines. It is a calm, clear night. Deep stillness reigns over all the land, and the stars shine out with splendor from the Syrian sky. A flock of sheep lying down upon the plain is being watched by their faithful shepherds. Suddenly there is a light shining round about them which they recognize as coming from no star. It is the glory of the Lord. They look up in wonder and, behold, there stands by them an angel of the Lord, "and they were sore afraid." Then came the glad announcement, "Be not afraid; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people. For there is born to you this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord."

What an announcement was this! The world had long been waiting for it. What a glad message it was! It was, indeed, better news than the people of that age could possibly understand or fully appreciate. While the shepherds were in amazement at this annunciation a second act in the wonderful drama occurred, for "suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying,

"Glory to God in the highest,
And on earth peace among men in whom He is well pleased."

There is evidence here that the angel, at least, had some comprehension of the greatness of the event which they celebrated by their angelic song.

In what sense was the birth of Christ "good tidings of great joy" to "all the people?"

It was the entering of the divine into the human—the union of divinity and humanity, revealing the relationship between God and man as it could have been revealed in no other way. Because man was created in the image of God it was possible for God to manifest Himself in the flesh, in the form of a man who lived the divine life under human conditions.

It was good news because it was a declaration that God had visited the earth with a view of redeeming it. When the "Word became flesh and dwelt among us," we may rest assured it was no idle excursion, no ordinary message which was to be delivered. No less an enterprise than the redemption of the race would have justified this infinite condescension.

The birth of Jesus was the birth of a Savior. This made it "good news." The world needed saving. It was a lost world because it was a sinful world. The name of this child was called Jesus because He would save His people from their sins. The best news that ever came to this world was the possibility of salvation from sin. The coming of Jesus made this possible.

The birth of Jesus opened a wellspring of hope in the wide desert of human despair. It pointed the race to a new destiny. It was an index finger pointing to a rift in the clouds of human sorrow, which opened out into the infinite blue of future blessedness. It introduced an era of peace on earth and good will among men, which has been growing in power and extent through all the centuries, bringing nations and peoples closer together and uniting them in a common brotherhood. It was the birth of One who came to show us the Father, to reveal to us a God of infinite love and tenderness, who has been seeking, through all the centuries, to bring man unto reconciliation with Himself and so complete His happiness and well-being.

No wonder the angel announced it as good news. No wonder the heavenly choir came down that night to sing the Gloria In Excelsis over the Judean plain. No marvel that wise men came from the East with their gifts of frankincense and myrrh to make an offering at the cradle of the new-born King. Nor is it strange that as centuries roll by the world is gathering more and more under the banner of this King of humanity whose birth we are celebrating these Christmas times. May He be born anew in all our hearts and reign therein with increasing power over all our lives!

PRAYER.

O God, our Father, we thank Thee for Thy greatest gift to men—the unspeakable gift of thy dear Son. We thank Thee for His lowly birth, for His identification with our human struggles and sorrows, for His triumph over sin and death, and for the marvelous achievements He has wrought in the world, and for what He is doing to-day for the uplifting of the race. May we open our hearts more widely to receive Him for whom there was no room in the inn, and may His reign within us make our lives resplendent by the pursuit of noble ends and by the performance of kindly deeds. And may His reign increase until the whole earth shall be filled with His glory! We ask it in His name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

There is no accounting for tastes. What seems most congenial to one is often very repulsive to another. If one wishes to pass through this world snapping and snarling at everything he doesn't like, and taking particular pains to hunt up things he doesn't like, there is no law to prevent him from doing so, but when he leaves the world he will not leave many people behind him to mourn his departure. Our country, no doubt, has its faults, but if a man should devote his entire time to pointing out the defects of his country and expatiating on the foibles and follies of his countrymen, he would soon be suspected of having no great love for his country or for his fellowmen. If a writer feels it to be his duty to be always hunting for faults and flaws in the writings of his brethren, and in throwing suspicion on the soundness of men occupying prominent positions, his brethren will have to tolerate it, of course, for is he not conscientious in this congenial employment? But, after all, how unprofitable and how miserable a business it is! The world is not helped in that way. One-eyed men, who see faults but have no eye to see virtues and graces, have never made successful reformers. Such men do not lift the world to higher levels. It is said of a certain class of people that "they are never so happy as when they are miserable." If people really enjoy being miserable, and in making other people miserable, perhaps we ought to try and bear it for their sake.

The Easy Chair came across a phrase the other day in a new book which struck him as a happy description of a certain class of preachers. The author was magnifying the office of preaching, and pointing out that every new era in the world's history had been introduced by a preacher, and then he spoke of the danger of preachers degenerating from being prophets of a new era to become "mere guardians of theological dogmas." What a fall is that! Instead of standing on the mountain top, the proclaimer of good news for the world, and a prophet of the golden age yet to be, he has his back upon the glowing future and is devoting his precious time and energies to guarding certain theological dogmas which have been formulated in the distant past, and which may at the time when they were formed have expressed the truth for that time, but which, in the progress of the centuries, have become useless for the living problems of our time. Truth—the everliving truth of God—needs no "guardians" to defend it. It simply needs to be proclaimed, and when so proclaimed it becomes its own defense. But human creeds, theological formulas, hoary opinions which have been handed down, and which have no living connection with the thought and life of our times—these need "guardians." Why not gather them all up, put them in a theological museum, under glass, where no sacriligious touch can harm them, and turn the ministry loose to fight the battles of to day and to minister to the pressing needs of the generation in the midst of which they live? "Let the dead bury the dead" is a principle that has direct application to these outgrown dogmas and opinions.

We are greatly indebted to the past. All that we have to-day of truth and liberty, of enlightenment, of intellectual and moral greatness, is an inheritance from the past. Any man that supposes that he can dispense with history and its great lessons has not even learned the alphabet of human knowledge. The past is rich in struggles, toils, sacrifices and triumphs. It is even rich in its mistakes, its false methods, its failures and its defeats. These, too, are teachers from which we may learn valuable lessons. But the past is not simply a storehouse upon which to feed while we turn our backs upon the future and glorify the deeds of generations gone. It is rather a platform upon which we may stand while we seek to make new conquests of truth, and achieve new victories. It is a pedestal upon which we may stand while we reach up after higher things. It furnishes the key by which we may unlock the closed doors that shut out from our view a better future. The chief glory of the past is that it is an introduction to something far better. The best use that we can make of the past is to gather from it lessons of wisdom by which to make the future a brighter and better era. Instead of being "guardians of theological dogmas," the ministry of to-day should be heralds of that brighter era only now beginning to dawn upon the world.

ECHOES FROM THE METHODIST CONGRESS.

Dr. Mills, speaking before the Methodist Congress in this city, last week, on the progress made in the present century, said: "I have read the record that as late as 1854 the Oneida Conference passed a resolution petitioning the governor of Delaware to pardon a minister who had been sentenced for being found with a copy of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' in his possession." And that was only 45 years ago! Is the world advancing?

Dr. Hughes, of Kansas City, speaking on "Christian Science," gave the following humorous account of Mrs. Eddy's method of biblical exegesis:

"We are," said Dr. Hughes, "curious to notice what peculiar features in these isolated Scriptures invite the earnest attention of Mrs. Eddy. In the first passage, in the tenth chapter of Revelation, it is 'a mighty angel come down from heaven.' We are asked to notice that 'he had in his hand a little book.' Mrs. Eddy asks: 'Is this angel, or message from God, Divine Science, that comes in a cloud?' Later she writes: 'Did this same little book contain the revelation of Divine Science?' Then follows an exhortation: 'Mortal, obey the heavenly evangel. Take up Divine Science. Read it from beginning to end.' In other words, the angel to Mrs. Eddy is a book agent, and his message is an advertisement. The mighty angel is sent to urge upon the attention of mortals 'Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures,' copyrighted by Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy, cloth, single copies, prepaid, $3.18; sheep, $4; Levant, divinity circuit, Bible paper, gilt edges, round corners, calf-lined, silk-sewed, prepaid, $6; morocco, convenient for pocket, prepaid, $5. Address all orders for the little book advertised by the mighty angel, to Joseph Armstrong, C. S. D., publisher, 95 Falmouth St., Boston, Mass. There have been a great many startling and unique interpretations of Revelation, but we venture to affirm that this may claim palm."

One of the most weighty utterances before the Congress was that by Dr. W. W. King, of this city, who, treating the subject, "The Church in the Cities," gave one cause of failure which we are sure will commend itself to the hearty approval of our readers. He said:

The purely spiritual work of the church, however, is greatly hampered in what is called "down-town districts" by a lack of churches and workers. The churches have moved "uptown" Those parts which need the most churches have the fewest. Most of our Protestant churches in St Louis are west of Twenty-seventh Street. All that vast region east is practically without a house of worship. The reason is the spirit of intense denominationalism, which, under the guise of Christian activity and zeal, is one of the greatest enemies to Christianity of the present age. It is scandalous and in many cases absolutely diabolical. You may see the manifestation of this spirit in the little town which, though not able to support one church decently, will have five or six, each one trying to pull the others down. The same is true in the cities, and this spirit is responsible for the general moving away from down-town. The people in the cities move and live on the most fashionable boulevards and in the most exclusive, aristocratic sections, who are as far away from Christ and as ignorant of Christianity as the people in the lowest slums. To meet the necessities of these new settlements some new denomination builds a church. Forthwith every other denomination begins to figure upon getting another in the same neighborhood, lest this new one should pick up some of its members who live near by. So we have in this and every other great city the spectacle of half a dozen churches of different denominations all located within two or three squares of each other. The solution of this is in Christian co-operation. We must recognize and study the fact that in trying to redeem the cities the important thing is not to get people into this, that or the other church, but to get them converted to Christ.

In a lecture by Bishop Vincent on Thursday evening on "The Church of To-morrow," he predicted that the church of the future would be (1) the church militant, waging war on every form of evil and unrighteousness; (2) that it would revise its creeds, not destroying them or throwing them away, but preserving them just as one would preserve an old daguerreotype which showed how one's grandmother looked in the long ago. There was something better, however, than a daguerreotype or even a photograph, and that was the living friend; and there is something better than creed, even the modern creed, and that is the living Christ. The church of to-morrow would not only revise its creeds, but it would revise its Bibles. He had no sympathy with people who were afraid of the revised Bible. He believed that the church of the future would have a better Bible than we now have, because the discoveries that are being made in archæology and history would enable the scholars of the future to throw more light upon it. He had no fears about higher criticism, and pitied peopld who could make no distinction between atheistic and rationalistic criticism, and the criticism of the reverent and devout scholars who are devoting their lives to a better understanding of the Bible. The church of to-morrow would be (3) a holy, catholic church. He thought denominations would continue to exist as now, but that they would become broad enough and liberal enough to co-operate together in doing the work of God in the world. Let all the denominations, he said, build on their churches and raise their spires, and after awhile God would spring the arches that would unite them all into one glorious temple of the living God. The Bishop did not say it, but we would add, Blessed is the man or the church that co-operates with the Lord in springing these arches that are to unite the several churches of Christendom into one holy and blessed temple of the living God!

BIBLE TEACHING AT THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

BY C. A. YOUNG.

Members of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions:

I congratulate you upon the fact that during the year which is before us not only the Christian women of Virginia, but of the entire United States, are urged by our National Board to work and pray for the permanent endowment of the University of Virginia Bible Lectureship, founded by Col. Jno. B. Cary. The friend of the Virginia C. W. B. M. who fostered this work in the beginning, did not leave it a helpless orphan. The power of his noble life is still felt in our midst. His wife and children have been true to the purposes of his great heart in planning to have the inspired Word of God taught to the students of our time honored University in the interest of universal Christianity and devoid of all sectarian bias.

I. The Bible and Higher Education.

God guides the growing generations. There are purpose, plan and process in creation and in Christ. The purpose of God is to establish the kingdom of God in the earth. God's plan is redemptive. There shall be no universal kingdom of God which has not at its heart the cross of Christ. The process is historic and educational. The Bible is the inspired record of this divine process. A great scholar has called the Bible "the authentic record of the divine education of the race." The Bible reveals the purpose of God in creation and in redemption. As Kepler studied the stars he exclaimed: "O God! I think thy thoughts after thee!" But he who studies the Bible may say:—

"Stars are poor books and often times do miss,
This book of stars lights the way to eternal bliss."

Kant might well be awed as he contemplated the starry heavens above and the moral law within. But without the inspired Word of God, most men fail to behold the glory of God in nature, or hear the whisperings of the Holy Spirit to their consciences. The Bible is the Book of Life; literature is the interpretation of life and the biblical literature is the best interpretation of life. From the standpoint of culture alone, to say nothing of Christianity, every educated man should have a fair knowledge of the Bible. The divine library, which we call the sacred Scriptures, contains the noblest biography and the best literature. The Psalms of David, the poetry of Job, the history of Joseph and of Daniel surpass the Divine Comedy of Dante, the great Epic of Milton or Plutarch's Lives. Higher education cannot ignore the Bible or the biblical languages. No education can be called "higher," however broad and varied, which neglects the literature that has exerted the greatest influence upon our Christian civilization. In some of our Northern States the reading of the Bible is prohibited from the public schools, but Jefferson planned to have the best room in the rotunda of the University set apart for religious exercises. The symmetrical education of our young men demands not only athletic training and intellectual discipline, but the development of the religious nature also. Some one has said: "Religion still stands in the foremost files of the world's most strenuous endeavors." It is as essential to the University student as to the student in our denominational college. Religion is the breath of God, the life of man, the vigor of the will and the mainspring of conscience.

II. That our State Universities should have religious influences thrown around them is in keeping with the past history of our country. The controlling forces in the foundation of our government were the love of liberty and the fear of God. True, we are thoroughly committed to the separation of church and state; it is also true that we cannot use state funds for religious instruction, but the law of our land is not opposed to the teachings of the Bible from the standpoint of history and literature, if Christian people are generous enough to endow Bible lectureships and Bible chairs for the benefit of University students. On the contrary, it desires the co-operation of the church in the higher education of our youth. Judge Story said: "There has never been a period when the common law did not recognize Christianity as lying at its foundation." To refuse to recognize the authority of the Bible in the development of the students in our State Universities would be contrary to the genius of our institutions, and even to the spirit of our laws. From the standpoint of the state, education is designed to produce good citizens, but religion is as essential to true education as science. Even Huxley has said that "Science and religion are twin sisters, and either would suffer with the neglect of the other." Nothing will more certainly conduce to the making of good citizens than the systematic study of the prophets of Israel and the teaching of Jesus. When we consider the fact that the University of Virginia sends more men to Congress than Yale, Columbia and Princeton combined, we realize the importance, from the standpoint of citizenship alone, of having the living Word of God taught to our University students.

III. I can only briefly sketch the history of the Bible Lectureship at the University of Virginia.

(a) Small as the University of Virginia is when compared with Harvard, Yale and the State universities of the North and West, our University has been justly recognized as leading the van in great educational ideas. (See address of Dr. J. B. Angell at the University of Chicago, on Founder's Day, last July.) Mr. W. T. Harris, our United States Commissioner of Education, of whom all American scholars are justly proud, has said to me: "I consider the University of Virginia one of the great universities of the world." Among State universities the University of Virginia was the pioneer in advocating the importance of Bible study in higher education. As early as 1822 the Board of Visitors, at Mr. Jefferson's request, invited the various denominations to establish theological schools on the confines of the University. Two reasons for this action were given: First, that the students of the University might have the benefit derived from such schools; and secondly, that the students of such schools might have the benefit of lectures, libraries, etc., furnished by the University. The invitation of the Board of Visitors was not in vain. It emphasized the principle that religious culture is essential to true education.

(b) The problem of systematic Bible study in State universities was first solved by Christian women. In unselfishness and Christlike generosity, the C. W. B. M. established the English Bible Chair, on the foundation of which any evangelical scholar can be invited to give Bible lectures to the students of the University of Michigan. Last year the C. W. B. M., under the leadership of Mrs. Helen E. Moses, completed the raising of $25,000 for the endowment of an English Bible Chair, on the foundation of which one hundred and eighty-three students pursued systematic Bible study at Ann Arbor, Mich.

(c) In 1897 Dr. H. L. Willett gave a brief course of Bible lectures at the University of Virginia. Since then Dr. Carl E. Grammer, of the Episcopal Church; Jno. R. Sampey, of the Baptist Church; as well as myself, have given courses of lectures to our students. Our classes have not been large but earnest and appreciative. From the first report of the Advisory Committee (April, 1898,) I quote as follows: "That in selecting the Bible teachers and lecturers, the trustees of this fund should be guided by three principles: (1) Those engaged shall be evangelical scholars; (2) They shall be of the grade required of other university workers; (3) They shall be acceptable to the faculty committee."

This report also shows that twenty-three students gave five hours per week to systematic Bible study. They represented the following denominations: Episcopalians, 10; Presbyterians, 4; Methodists, 2; Baptists, 2; Disciples, 1; United Brethren, 1; Progressive Brethren, 1; Unitarians, 1; and no preference 1. Total, 23.

Many students took the Bible lectures who did not pursue systematic study. This commendable Bible work on the part of the students was largely due to two facts which should not be forgotten: First, the excellent pioneer work of the Y. M. C. A., and second, the sympathy of the faculty.

IV. The Present Status of the Bible Teaching at the University of Virginia.

1. The sympathy manifested by individual members of the faculty increases as the work progresses.

2. The University pastor, Rev. J. M. Brodnax, and the officers of the Y. M. C. A., as well as the young gentlemen students of the University, co-operate heartily in the work.

3. During the year over twelve thousand dollars has been secured toward the permanent endowment of the University of Virginia Bible Lectureship, founded by John B. Cary.

4. We have four English Bible classes, numbering in all more than forty students. Besides these, Prof. Noah K. Davis lectures to about one hundred students every Lord's day on the life of Jesus of Nazareth.

5. We have ten students in Hellenistic Greek and Hebrew together.

6. Three years of experience, with constantly increasing interest, has clearly demonstrated that when the Bible itself is taught simply as the inspired Word of God, the best students of the University are not only willing but eager to study it systematically from the standpoint of history and literature.

*An Address before the State Convention, Richmond, Va.

The Bible Lecturship is not meant as a substitute for our denominational colleges and seminaries, but to encourage the students who come from our collleges to the University to be loyal in their service of the divine Christ and systematic in their study of the inspired Word of God.

THE MINISTER AND HIS LIBRARY.

W. J. RUSSELL.

There is no calling so high and noble as that in which the Christian minister is engaged. His life's work stands by itself, in peculiar consecration, and is lifted up above the other pursuits of men in singular eminence. Among the elements which are absolutely essential to his success I know of none more important than culture, which denotes breadth and strength as well as symmetry and finish. The age in which we live demands that the minister shall not only be a man in the highest and deepest and broadest and best sense of that noble word, but he must be a man of thought—a man who can meet all the currents and whirpools of modern skeptical thinking. Dean Church says: "We owe it to the church, we owe it to the time in which God has called us to labor, we owe it to the restless and perplexed but often honest minds in whose presence we carry on our ministry, to be not merely a hard-working, but a learned clergy. To those great questions which both stir and disquiet men we are bound to bring that knowedge which will give us a claim to be listened to. 'Know as much as you can;' that ought to be the rule to which an educated minister should hold himself forever tied. A minister ought to be a student, a reader and a thinker to the very end."

The minister, therefore, must have books. He needs these not less than the farmer needs his plow. They are his best friends, always on hand to give instruction, entertainment and encouragement. But the choice of the books that go to make up his library, like that of friends, is a serious duty. Carlyle has divided literature into two kinds—"sheep and goats." Mr. Ruskin makes a similar distinction, and makes clear the fact that the real value of any book is to be measured by its serviceableness. "There is a literature of knowledge and a literature of power," says DeQuincy; and knowledge that can never be transmuted into power becomes mere intellectual rubbish. "A good book," in the noble words of Milton, "is the precions life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life." To such books give your whole attention. Do not care although you may be taunted with not knowing many books. When old Hobbles was asked why he had not read more—"Read more!" he exclaimed, "if I had read as many books as other men I would have been as ignorant as other men." "Dread the man of one book!" says the Latin proverb. If one reads but one book he may read that one book so well as to be a very hard man to encounter. What a formidable antagonist he would be who had thoroughly studied Shakespeare, who had grasped his plots, who had analyzed his characters, who had scaled his highest thoughts, who had sounded his deepest pathos, who had caught the aroma of his most delicate fancies! What a grasp of intellect he would have! What a breadth of sympathy! What a knowledge of human nature! What a command of wit and wisdom and choice sentiments—"thoughts that breathe and words that burn!"

Prof. Blackie, of Edinburgh University, gives us the following excellent advice, which cannot be too well considered: "Keep in mind," he says, "that though the library shelves groan with books, whose name is legion, there are in each department only a few great books, in relation to which others are but auxiliary, or it may be sometimes parasitical, and, like the ivy, doing harm rather than good to the pole round which they cling. Stick, therefore, to the great books, the original books, the fountain heads of great ideas and noble passions, and you will learn joyfully to dispense with the volumes of accessory talk by which their virtue has been as frequently obscured as illuminated."

The value of a library, then, depends on its quality rather than its quantity. A selection is better than a collection. Numbers count only when each book has positive value. It is not rash to say that the defect in the formation of most ministerial libraries is that they have been collected on no principle, but in a haphazard way. Before entering upon the specific details of my subject I wish to call your attention to the following general principles which should govern each one in the formation of a library:

1. Remember that only a few books can be read out of the many that are published. It has been computed that we now have at least 25,000 new books made every year. But to read 25 books a year, with a few of our leading papers and magazines, is quite as much as the average minister can possibly achieve, a rate at which only 1,250 books could be read in half a century. Since this is true, how important it is that the books we read should be of sterling worth—containing such food for thought as will stimulate the mind and enrich the character.

2. Avoid haste in deciding on the books you purchase. A glowing book notice does not always represent the true value of a book. Time will test its value. Emerson suggested a year as the normal probation of a book. At the termination of that period of time it is safe to buy if the general verdict is in its favor. Nine times out of ten it is not the book of to-day that the minister wants in his library so much as the seasoned book of years.

3. Get the best books of the best authors in the best editions. Great care should be taken here. Many a great work—like Neander's great church history and Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity—has been cast aside unappreciated, simply because it was poorly bound, printed on cheap paper and in small type. An index is a very important part of a good book, and saves many a weary hunt after information. The best editions are always the cheapest, although they may cost more in dollars and cents. A library made up of such books is a circle of most intimate friends. Robert Southey's fine poem, "Stanzas Written in My Library," expresses this with equal truth and beauty. The poem should be memorized by every lover of books. The poet says:

"My days among the dead are past;
Around me I behold,
Where'er these casual eyes are cast,
The mighty minds of old;
My never-failing friends are they,
With whom I converse day by day.

"With them I take delight in weal,
And seek relief in woe;
And while I understand and feel
How much to them I owe,
My cheeks have often been bedewed
With tears of thoughtful gratitude.

"My thoughts are with the dead; with them
I live in long-past years,
Their virtues love, their faults condemn,
Partake their hopes and fears,
And from their lessons seek and find
Instruction with a humble mind.

"My hopes are with the dead, anon
My place with them will be,
And I with them shall travel on
Through all futurity;
Yet, leaving here a name, I trust,
That will not perish in the dust."

To be specific in naming the best books and periodicals that should have a place in the minister's library is no easy task. The enormous amount of literature in the world, and the infinite variety of tastes, circumstances and talents, among those who preach the gospel, forbid us in giving a definite list. There are, however, certain books in the several departments of library growth that are worthy to stand at the head of the column, and these I will mention.

ACTUAL AND FORMAL REMISSION OF SINS.

J. B. BRINEY.

It is a fact, that all reasoning on the remission of sins, based on human governments, is fallacious on account of a lack of parallelism. The Government of the United States exists independent of the President, and the latter exists independent of the former, and one can sin against the President without sinning against the government, and the reverse. Not so, however, as regards God and his government. To sin against him is to sin against his government, and to sin against his government is to sin against him. To forgive a sin against him is to forgive a sin against his government, and the reverse. All talk about actually forgiving sin against God and formally forgiving the same sin against his government is a species of hair-splitting metaphysics that darkens counsel.

It is a fact, that the argument based on the family is unsound, because it assumes that God is the Father of all alike, just as an earthly father is the father alike of the good and obedient, and the froward and disobedient children of the family. Jesus told certain parties that Satan was their father, and surely they did not sustain the same relation to God that his children do. This family reasoning possibly might apply to God and his family, but not to others. "If we [his children] confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us." But an alien, in becoming a child of God, must "repent and be baptized for the remission of sins." In the case of the child of God, is confession for the formal remission of sins, actual remission having already taken place? This is as reasonable as actual and formal remission for the alien.

It is a fact, that the forgiveness of sins is a matter of divine revelation, and all we know or can know about it must be learned from that source. Wonder if this is "dangerous legalism!" To risk so vital a matter as divine forgiveness on human philosophy and reasoning is dangerous presumption, a sin from which the psalmist prayed to be kept back. The spectre of "legalism" has lost its power to frighten sensible people. Let those who call unquestioning reliance upon the plain teaching of the Word of God "dangerous realism" be prepared to answer to God for it.

It is a fact, that Jesus Christ puts baptism before remission of sins, and gives no intimation of an "actual remission" going before baptism. "Except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." There are but two spiritual kingdoms in this world, the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan, and every man must be in one or the other. One actually forgiven is in the kingdom of God. But into this kingdom one cannot go without baptism. Therefore, actual remission is not reached before baptism. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Here salvation, which includes remission, follows baptism, and no hint is given that salvation has a double meaning. The philosophy that divides the meaning of this word, promising actual salvation to the believer and formal salvation to the baptized believer, does violence to the plain teaching of Christ.

It is a fact, that when a believer is said not to be condemned, to be justified, to have eternal life, etc., an obedient believer is meant. "But he that looketh into the perfect law, the law of liberty, and so continueth, being not a hearer that forgetteth, but a doer that worketh, this man shall be blessed in his doing." Take care, James; the philosophical critic is abroad, and you are in danger of being arraigned for teaching a "dangerous legalism!" "Nevertheless, even of the rulers many believed on him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue; for they loved the glory of men more than the glory of God" (John 12:42). Here is the strongest expression known to New Testament Greek to indicate relations between Christ and believers: they believed into (eis) him. If there is any phrase that indicates entering into a saved relation to Christ by faith alone, this is the one. But actual-and-formal remissionists will hardly claim that those rulers were actually forgiven. What did they lack? They lacked obedience. "If you confess me before men, I will confess you before my Father." Confession is just as formal, just as outward, just as legal, as baptism. Christ teaching a "dangerous legalism!" Divine law dangerous!! Simply to notice that the justified, saved, regeneratad believer is the obedient believer will remove all the "quibbles" that Mr. Campbell charged Mr. Rice with raising over those passages.

It is a fact, that the apostles put baptism before remission and failed to give notice of the distinction of actual and formal remission. They were certainly as capable of making that distinction as any modern philosopher; and if they had ever dreamed of any such distinction, they surely would have made it in plain and explicit terms. They plainly and explicitly said, "Repent and be baptized . . . for the remission of sins;" "Baptism doth also now save you;" "Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins;" "According to his mercy he saved us through the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit," etc. Is it reasonable to suppose that the authors of such language entertained this modern dream of actual and formal remission? Their language excludes any such idea, and according to modern philosophers they taught a "dangerous legalism!" Christ I know, and Peter I know, and Paul I know, and Ananias I know; but who are these philosophers that are more capable of giving the will of God than they were?

It is a fact, that the whole trend of Scripture teaching is to the effect that salvation is conditioned on obedience to the gospel. "Ye became obedient from the heart to that form of teaching whereunto ye were delivered, and being made free from sin, ye became servants of righteousness" (Rom. 6:17). "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. 8:1). More "dangerous legalism!" "Seeing ye have purified your souls in your obedience to the truth" (1 Peter 1:22). "He became unto all them that obey him the author of eternal salvation" (Heb. 5:9). "Rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and to them that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus" (2 Thess. 1:8). "What shall be the end of them that obey not the gospel of God?" (1 Peter 4:17.) It is marvelous how full of "dangerous legalism" the Bible is!

It is a fact, that "through his name," in Acts 10:43, implies baptism. Mr. Campbell so contended, and Dr. Hackett says nothing to the contrary. Hear him: "The condition of salvation is faith in Christ; and this condition brings the attainment of pardon within the reach of all." A certain condition may bring the attainment of an education within the reach of all; but an education being attainable is very different from an education being in possession. Peter simply taught in Acts 10:43 what he taught in Acts 2:38, namely, that remission comes through Christ in obedience to the gospel.

It is a fact, that Mr. Campbell said that he stood with the Greek and Latin fathers on this subject, and those fathers held baptism to be for the remission of sins, and failed to make the distinction of actual and formal remission. It is a further fact, that Mr. Campbell repudiated this distinction by using many and strong statements that are utterly inconsistent with it, and nothing has been quoted from Dr. Richardson or any other source to disprove this. It is a still further fact, that Mr. Rice pressed the McCalla statement upon Mr. C. with powerful emphasis, proposing to shake hands and unite with him on the idea that a believer's sins are actually pardoned before baptism. The fact that Mr. C. failed to meet this proposition and made no effort to defend said statement amounts to an unmistakable abandonment of it.

It is a fact, that no Creed, Confession of Faith or Discipline in Christendom countenances the visionary distinction of actual and formal remission, putting one before and the other after baptism.

It is a fact, that not only the Central Baptist, but all other sectarian papers, and all sectarian pulpits, agree that a believer's sins are actually pardoned before baptism; and it is a further fact that these papers and pulpits never understood Mr. Campbell as agreeing with them. That he did is a recent discovery, and removes the offense of the Reformation in the eyes of sectarians, provided they can possibly believe it to be true; in which event they and the whole world must conclude that both they and we have been making "much ado about nothing" for three-quarters of a century!

It is a fact, that this distinction has no support in the world's scholarship. In the June number of the Biblical World a correspondent asked Dr. Harper this question: "Does Acts 2:38 teach that the verbs 'repent' and 'be baptized' are to be obeyed that remission may be received?" I quote from memory, but with substantial accuracy. Dr. Harper answers laconically thus: "Yes." In a letter to me Dr. Albert Barnes says that the same passage teaches that repentance and baptism are "in order to the remission of sins," and adds that it was the purpose of Peter to state the "complete divine arrangement in connection with the remission of sins," and refers to Mark 16:16. In a letter to me the late Dr. Boise, of Chicago, says that in this passage "we have repentance in faith, baptism and remission of sins, all in regular sequence." I quote these letters from memory, not having them with me. Dr. Hackett's interpretation of the passage is well known. Dr. Willmarth says that "the world's scholarship is with the Campbellites" on this passage, and endorses the scholarship; and that, too, without any thought that either the "Campbellites" or the scholars ever supposed that "in order to the remission of sins" has a double meaning. Prof. Tyler, of Amherst College, says: "Remission of sins is the object and end (or result) of repentance and baptism. The meaning may perhaps be more definitely expressed thus: Repent and let every one of you be baptized, to the end that your sins may be forgiven." Prof. Cameron, of Princeton, says: "The preposition eis in Acts 2:38 is evidently used in its final sense; and the phrase is clearly connected with repent and be baptized as the end to which repentance and baptism in the name of Jesus Christ led." With the foregoing testimony agrees that of Dr. Schaff, Dr. Meyer, Dr. Lange, Prof. Packard, of Yale; Prof. Foster, of Colby; Prof. D'Ooge, of Ann Arbor; Prof. Flagg, of Cornell; Prof. Proctor, of Dartmouth; Prof. Harkness, of Brown, and every other scholar worth mentioning. No scholar, no critic, no exegete hints at a double meaning in "for the remission of sins"—"actual remission" following repentance and "formal remission" following baptism. The notion is unscholarly, unscientific, unscriptural and untrue. I stand with the world's scholarship, the obvious teaching of the Scriptures and the position that the great body of the brotherhood have occupied from the beginning; and I do not propose to surrender now, just as the victory, after one of the most remarkable struggles known to religious controversy, has been fairly won. If that be "dangerous legalism," then make the most of it! By the way, if the person who is quoted as branding my position as "dangerous liberalism" will uncover himself, come out into the open, and affirm that "the sins of an alien sinner are forgiven before baptism," I promise to make it exceedingly interesting for him.

To a line of brethren extending from New York to California, who have assured me of their approval of my position and arguments I express my appreciation of their kindness. I do not care to quote expressions, but I could compile quite a booklet of "mighty interesting reading."

HERESY—CAUSE AND CURE.

J. M. LOWE.

The word heresy means to take for one's self, to choose. In other words, a heretic is one who is so unfortunate as to have an opinion of his own! To be a heretic is an inalienable right!

Briggs is a heretic, so called, because he cannot think with the brains of the other fellows, but was compelled to use his own. This at bottom is heresy. The only way to stop it is to quit thinking. There would be no evil come of heresy if one would not persist in thinking for another. Here all the trouble begins. Ecclesiastical dignity may be disturbed, it is true, but this may do good rather than harm, since the man expelled is as pure in heart and noble in life as are those who remain in the fold. It cannot be sinful to think for one's self. Neither is it sinful to disagree intellectually with good people. One cannot help thinking, but he can keep from forcing his thoughts upon others. Here is the cause of that thing which comes to the surface as heresy. One age cannot think for the next. If one age must make a creed the next must revise it, if it choose, and has the right so to do. The trouble is not broad thinking, it is narrow theology. A recent writer says in the Independent that those who make the doctrines of the church have a duty—to make such doctrines as the people can accept. Yes, the maker of doctrines has a duty; that is, to quit making them. Creed-making is the root of the whole matter. Each one may make his own creed; that is, to think for himself, but when he attempts to think for another there is a heresy trial on hands. Do I condemn the creeds? Not in so far as they contain truth which existed before them and is the heritage of the world. Their claim to acceptance AS SUCH is condemned. A creed is not the truth, but the statement of it. Truth does not depend upon an arrangement of words. Where was the truth before the first creedmaker was born?

What if the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father or from the Father and the Son? He proceeded without consulting anybody, and we can be of no particular service to the Almighty now, especially since the whole thing is over. What if God foreordained some or none to eternal life? Is the number limited to those who believe he did? And what are they going to do about it? These and others similar are themes about which we must think, of course, but what we think about them is a matter of the slightest possible moment. The creed which is not broad enough to include all Christians is not the creed of the New Testament. Faith in Jesus the Christ with all the heart and loyalty to him in all the life—this statement contains all the truth of all the creeds in Christendom and none of their error. Christendom accepts this creed to-day, but seems not yet to have learned that it is the essential creed, with room enough for all the intellectual differences of people who are loyal to Christ and love each other as he has loved them.

The spirit of this creed is—one in faith where we agree and one in love where we differ. We cannot think alike, but it is ours to love alike. The commandment is not, Little children agree with one another, but "love one another." Love is the principle of unity. Love is the power that brought the church into being, and the same is the only power that can preserve it a unit. Sin is divisive; love is unifying. Sin is centrifugal; love is centripetal. What gravitation is to the material universe, the same is love to the spiritual universe, and Jesus is that love personified. Differences can never pass away, but love can encompass them all.

When will the scattered sons of God listen to love's bugle-blast, and under one banner press the battle to the ends of the earth? When will one church with one message of light call heaven's forgotten sons and daughters back to the hearthstone where there is rest and peace? The weary world must wait until there is one flock and one shepherd. For this Jesus prayed "that the world might believe."

DR. WHITSITT'S STATEMENT IN REGARD TO DR. J. R. GRAVES—A PROTEST.

S. H. FORD.

In the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of November 9th is found an editorial, "Dr. Whitsitt on Baptist Succession." The editor, after quoting from Dr. Whitsitt's article in the Journal and Messenger, makes prominent Whitsitt's reference to J. R. Graves as holding and teaching that membership in a visible body is essential, to salvation —"In other words, he held that salvation is not possible outside a Baptist Church. He places the church before Christ and the water before the blood."

I am truly sorry that Dr. Whitsitt ever made such a rash and unfounded statement, and as it has been published in your widely circulated journal I am sure you will permit me to show that it has no foundation in fact.

Intimately associated with J. R. Graves, during an ordinary lifetime, I can testify that he antagonized, with all the force that was in him, such a travesty on his views and teachings. This personal knowledge is confirmed by his frequent denials of it and his forceful proclamation of the very opposite. Here are some of his emphatic expressions:

Persons "quickened," made alive by the Spirit, are called "living stones;" and of such is his church said to be "built up a spiritual house," and to such—"the saved" —alone are to be added. All human societies baptize and add to the church in order to save. Baptists do it because they believe the subject is saved. They invariably place Christ before the church, while all others place the church before Christ.

Again, as to Pedobaptist ministers he says:

Refusing to affiliate with them ministerially and ecclesiastically is not declaring by our act that we believe their ministers are unregenerate, but that they are not members of scriptural churches. Refusing to invite their ministers to preach for our churches, and to accept their immersions, is no more denying their Christian character than refusing to invite them to our communion table. We mean, by our refusal, to emphasize our protest against their organizations as scriptural churches. In all the teaching in God's Word, where the plan of salvation is referred to or pointed to, even by a type, it is blood before water.

On succession he says:

Those who oppose "church succession" confuse the unthinking by representing our position to be that the identical organization which Christ established—the first church of Judea—has had a continual existence until to-day, or that the identical churches planted by the apostles, or at least some one of them, has continued until now, and that Baptist ministers are successors of the apostles. I have for a full quarter of a century, by pen and voice, vehemently protested against these misrepresentations, as Baptists have for twice as many more against the charge of teaching that no one can be saved without immersion, and quite as vainly; for those who oppose us seem determined to misrepresent, and will not be corrected.—Old Landmarkism, page 122.

We need add no more. We wish to use no harsh words in the denunciation of the charge that Graves held or taught that "salvation is not possible outside of a Baptist Church," as Dr. Whitsitt asserts, and the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST quotes. He says: "No greater calamity has fallen on our Baptist brethren of the South." Thank God, no such calamity has fallen upon them, and the pity of the Doctor is gratuitous.

[We are glad to give place to our venerable brother, the editor of the Repository, in defense of his old friend, Dr. Graves. We do not know whether this correction has been made in the Journal and Messenger, where Dr. Whitsitt's article first appeared, or not. After all, however, the important question is whether Southern Baptists hold the doctrine of "succession" in a sense that involves the denial that any other than a Baptist Church is a church of Christ. Even the quotations Dr. Ford gives from Dr. Graves shows that he regards all other churches as "human societies." We are sorry that Dr. Ford did not disclaim any sympathy with this narrow position, for the fact of his quoting it without such disapproval leaves the impression that he also, and presumably the Baptists for whom he speaks, hold with Dr. Graves on this subject. If this be true there is still room for Dr. Whitsitt's pity.—EDITOR.]

More of the Spirit.

I mean more of the spirit of love, which is the spirit of giving, the spirit of the Master, who gave himself for us. A day has been set apart for the especial manifestation of this spirit. That day is December 17. This is Ministerial Relief Day. There are those among us who are poor, who must be helped or they suffer, who to-day might be in affluent circumstances but for the sacrifices they made of opportunities and possibilities, yea, of life itself, that they might preach the gospel of Christ, do their part in the re-establishment of the apostolic church and save the world from sin. Important in a sense that we ought to realize, they gave their lives in an unselfish service for us. They did nobly thire part in making possible our present grand civilization. They preached a pure, enlightening, unselfish, unsectarian gospel. And we have to-day not only the heritage of the harvest of their sowing, but a few of these noble ones themselves, whom God hath preserved to us, and upon whom we might exercise our gratitude in that charity that remembereth the poor.

In their answers to our expressions of moneyed love, these good brethren and sisters pour out their expressions of gratitude and joy unbounded. Brethren in the ministry, read to your congregations some of these letters, found in our fourth annual report. It will do your people good. Give them an opportunity and they will respond to the call of the Lord. We will be glad to send you as many of these reports as you can judiciously distribute in your churches.

Send your contributions to Howard Cale, 120 E. Market St., Indianapolis, Ind.

Our Budget.

—See "Club Rates to Churches."

—We invite the churches into active co-operation?

—Now is the nick of time for enlisting new readers.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST doesn't claim to be "the whole thing;" it is only one of the agencies for advancing the kingdom.

—If you like its spirit, its teaching, its attitude toward the questions of our day, and think it worthy of your encouragement, then help us double its circulation.

—We take it that it is not so much a question as to whether the paper costs a few cents more than some other paper, as whether the paper represents that view of the Christian life and of our own religious reformation which you wish to see prevail. If it does not, you ought not to aid it if it was offered free; if it does, we have a right to expect your assistance in extending its usefulness.

—We are asked, "Will you not also lower the price of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to meet the competition?" Our reply is, We cannot possibly do so without lowering the literary standard of the paper. We are not going to raise the price of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the year 1900, notwithstanding the decided raise in cost of producing same. That ought to be good news for our readers. Besides that, we are planning for more work on the paper for the coming year than ever before. The special arrangement with churches, announced elsewhere, by which churches divide with us the expense of securing and mailing extra copies of the paper for the coming year, and secure the benefit of this saving, is the only way to get a reduced rate. The regular price of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to subscribers is $1 50.

—We have yet to hear from a man who thinks $1.50 too high a price for the kind of a paper we are producing. Our readers are not complaining at our price. They want the best article in the market, and they know that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is cheaper by fifty cents and a dollar than any religious paper of equal rank in any other religious body. Our people want as high a standard of religious journalism as any other religious body. Why put our splendid plea at the disadvantage of being advocated by cheap journals limited by low prices when our brethren are able to afford the best?

—A committee with headquarters at 180 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill., have in hand the raising of a fund for the erection of a monument to Eugene Field. And, as an inducement for subscription to this fund, the committee have prepared a special edition of Eugene Field's best poems, illustrated by thirty-two famous artists, a copy of which they propose to give each person subscribing not less than $1.00. The book is said to be worth $7.00. The fund raised by this committee is to be divided equally between the family of Eugene Field and the monument to his memory. This seems to be a philanthropic movement worthy of the confidence and participation of the wide and extended circle of friends and admirers of this lamented poet. For any further information address the Eugene Field Monument Souvenir Fund at the above-stated address.

—Referring to the letter and appeal from the Endeavor Society at San Juan, Porto Rico, for a reading room at that place which we published last week, we are glad to say that Bro. Dutcher, pastor of the church at Mexico, Mo., has taken that project under his special care and will receive subscriptions for that purpose. If you failed to read the article of Miss Stevens in our last number, turn to it and read it and give these young Endeavorers a note of encouragement—a $5.00 note would be the most acceptable.

—The paper mills are experiencing the results of a general revival of business. Paper such as that upon which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is printed has risen forty per cent in the last few weeks and the mills are unable to supply the demand. Type and other printing material has also made a decided advance. In spite of this fact it is expected that religious journals will be furnished right along at the same price. Is it not reasonable, then, for them to expect their patrons to lend some extra effort to increase their circulation? We think all our readers will answer this question affirmatively and act accordingly.

—By reading our "Club Rates to Churches" and our editorial on "An Opportunity for the Churches," our readers will see how they can enter into co-operation with us in so increasing our circulation that we can afford to put the paper to them at so cheap a rate in spite of the advance in price of printing material. A part of our expense is in securing subscriptions and another part in mailing the paper. If the churches will work with us in the way indicated in our offer of "Club Rates to Churches," they will save us this expense and get the benefit of it in a reduced rate. This is reciprocity.

—The editor has received repeated requests for the publication, in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, of his Jubilee address on "Lessons from Our Past." He had not intended making this use of it, but in deference to the judgment of many who heard it he has consented to its publication, and it will appear in the New Year's number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. As the address contains the very worst heresy of which the editor is guilty, it is altogether proper that our readers should know what it is, and——breathe easy!

—The Foreign Christian Missionary Society is the happy recipient of another $5,000 gift but it will take a number of gifts like this to insure the $200,000 for Foreign Missions in this, the Silver Jubilee Year of the society. We have no doubt however, that this gift will be multiplied many times during the year.

—The Annuity Plan of the Foreign Society is meeting with a hearty reception. Nearly $70,000 has been received on this plan and the secretaries are aiming to make the fund reach $100,000 during this, the Silver Jubilee Year. Annuitants receive interest semi-annually during life. It is to be hoped that the $100,000 will be reached.

—Upon the occassion of Bro. James Vernon leaving the pastorate of the church at Independence, Mo., a number of his friends presented him with a life directorship of $100 in our Church Extension Fund. The life directorship was paid to the Board of Church Extension in gold and the certificate was presented at his farewell service in Independence, which was held on Sunday evening, Dec. 10th. It will be remembered that the church at Independence recently raised $1,000 for Church Extension, and that Bro. Vernon has been pastor there for the past two years.

—A generous friend of Church Extension, Mrs. A. J. Russell, of Ada, Ohio, on November 8th, gave the Board of Church Extension $500 on the Annuity Plan. There ought to be a great many gifts of that amount in order to reach the $250,000 by the time of our next convention. If special gifts keep coming in for the remainder of the year as they have been, there will be no doubt about reaching the $50,000 to be aimed at this year. Sister Russell will take great pleasure in seeing her money work in housing homeless churches, while it is earning the annuity.

—At the Thanksgiving service of the Sixth and Prospect Ave. Church of Christ, Kansas City, Mo., a call was made for $3,500 to meet and clear up all indebtedness of the church, and to this the response was $3,700. Truly was this an occasion for thanksgiving to that people.

"Honor is Purchased by Deeds We Do."

Deeds, not words, count in battles of peace as well as in war. It is not what we say, but what Hood's Sarsaparilla does, that tells the story of its merit. It has won many remarkable victories over the arch enemy of mankind — impure blood. Remember —One of the handsomest, meatiest, and most up-to-date religious journals that comes to us is the Christian Oracle, of Chicago, now soon to be the Christian Century. Bros. Haley and Campbell are showing fine editorial ability, and they have a valuable helper in Prof. Willett, who is also on the editorial staff. The Oracle, with the change of name which is indicated above, and with a few other improvements, will rank with any of our papers, and ought to have a prosperous future. The paper stands for that view of things which is reinforced by "the little red schoolhouse," the college and the university. Such religious journals have a future.

—One of our contemporaries, in its zeal for increasing its circulation at a $1.00 rate, throws in a button with the picture of the editor thereon. The halo over the editor's head is distinctly visible to the naked eye, and reads, "We are with him for 50,000." An Illinois pastor in sending us in one of these, says: "You are losing a great deal of fame in not sending out such a button to your workers. You ought to try to keep up with the procession!" We do, as a rule, like to at least keep in sight of the procession, but this is too much for us. Not only is this button, embellished as it is with the editorial likeness, without any scriptural precedent, but it is, so far as we know, without any sort of precedent. Besides, it would not be safe for every paper to risk the welfare of its subscription list on the good looks of its editor. Of course, we can see that there is a great temptation on the part of the brethren and sisters, particularly the latter, to secure this button at any cost, even at the cost of subscribing for the paper in question, with a view of wearing it on the lapel of the coat, or, in the case of ladies, at the throat. There is an ethical question involved in this proceeding which we fear the paper has not sufficiently considered: Is it right to bring to bear so irresistible an incentive as this to increase the circulation of a religious journal? Is it fair to other religious papers which do not have the good fortune to be edited by so good-looking an editor? We do not pretend to answer this question. We simply throw it out for consideration. It is not right, we know, for other editors to be moved with envy, but how can it be helped under a provocation of this kind? There is a a biblical question also involved to which we invite the attention of the department of "Biblical Criticism." Does the commandment of the Decalogue against "graven images" suffer any infringement by this new method of advertising? We do not pronounce any dogmatic opinion on this question, but refer it at once to the department where such questions legitimately belong.

—We present our readers this week with a good picture of Prof. C. A. Young, of the Bible Chair in connection with the University of Virginia. His address to the C. W. B. M. of Virginia will also be found in another place. Bro. Young is too well known to most of our readers to require a biographical sketch. He is a Missouri boy, reared in St. Louis County and baptized in his youth by the editor of this paper. His career has been steadily onward and upward.

—The Thanksgiving souvenir of the Sixth and Prospect Avenue Church of Christ, Kansas City, Mo., is unique, handsome and valuable, containing as it does fine half-tone cuts of its elders and pastors, with brief sketches of the lives of the latter and also of the origin, growth and activities of the church. The church, its officers, pastors and its record are truly things to be thankful for, especially by its members and friends.

—J. Fraise Richard, of Washington, D. C., has written a series of three or four articles on the "Evolution of the Church of Christ" for our columns and the first article will appear in an early number. And while we are sure that all will enjoy these articles we especially commend them to the younger people of the church on account of their bearing upon the New Testament church. Bro. Richard has been at pains to be clear and instructive in the treatment of this important subject and merits a careful reading.

—In this issue we publish the first portion of an excellent paper on "The Minister and His Library," by W. J. Russell, of Rushville, Ind. As our space will not permit the appearance of the entire paper in one issue, we ask that our readers, especially the preachers, be the more careful to begin the article in this number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It will well repay a careful reading.

—The recent dedication of the new church building in Fredericksburg, Va., was an event of no small degree for the cause of primitive Christianity in the Eastern states. Large delegations were present from Richmond, Manchester and other points. The dedicatory sermon was preached in the afternoon by Prof. C. A. Young, of the University of Virginia. Other ministers presnet were J. L. Hill, president Tidewater Board, J. A. Spencer, of Manchester, S. H. Forrer, and J. P. Stump, of the Methodist Church. The old church was built in 1832, but was practically abandoned during the Civil War. The new house has been built at a cost of $2,500, and this amount represents a vast amount of energy on the part of a few Disciples, and especially Cephas Shelburne, now the pastor at Roanoke. Bro. Forrer is his successor at Fredericksburg. We are glad that the heroic struggle for the past few years has resulted so favorably for our brethren in this historic city, and we wish for them the most abounding prosperity in their new house and in this, to them, new era.

—Just one century ago on the 14th day of this month, "The Father of our Country," General Washington, died at his home in Mt. Vernon, and the day will be observed chiefly by the Masonic fraternity with appropriate memorial services. Some of the leading journals and magazines for the present month have also contributed to the occasion by suitable articles. And among the articles on the subject we have found none more interesting than that in Lippincott's, giving an accurate account of General Washington's sickness, which was of short duration (two days), and the heroic treatment o which he was subjected to the last moment. As is known, his sickness was an acute inflammation of the throat, contracted by exposure, on his farm to inclement weather. The disease developed rapidly and persistently, notwithstanding the vigorous effort of three physicians and others until he died, "11:30 o'clock, Saturday night, December 14, 1799, in the full possession of his intellect, and without a struggle." One of the valuable purposes of this article in Lippincott's, aside from the information it contains about the sickness and death of General Washington, is the opportunity it affords for noting the marked improvement during the century, especially the latter quarter, in medicinal methods, remedies, etc. In the short space of twelve hours General Washington was bled twice, "copiously," the affected part blistered, swallowed two "moderate" doses of calomel, given an injection, bled the third time (fourth in all, once in the early morning before any physician had arrived), made to inhale vinegar vapor, another dose of calomel (ten grains), and repeated doses of emetic tartar. in the light of present medicinal remedies and methods the foregoing looks cruel, if not barbarous, and yet the writer, Solos Cohen, M. D., declares that, in the light of medical science as it then existed, the attending physician, Dr. Craik, and his consulting physicians did the wisest things that could be done in their efforts to save the life of their distinguished patient. But how different would have been the treatment today, even in the same school of medicine! And yet, our margin for boasting is small. The greatest discoveries in medical and surgical science are of recent years, and it is now believed that President Garfield was ignorantly and uselessly tortured, and that with the use of an X-ray lamp his life might have been saved to his family and to his country from that fearful tragedy through which he passed, but to greater glory.

—After a service of 52 years as pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, in Brooklyn, N. Y., Dr. Storrs placed his resignation in the hands of his church to their surprise and to their sorrow. The letter which was prepared by Dr. Storrs and read to the church by his son-in-law, Rev. Dr. Coe, is one of the most beautiful and sweet-spirited messages at such a time that it has ever been our pleasure to read. There is no bitterness, no complaint with either God or men, but a calm, sweet resignation to circumstances, to the church and to God. Would that such a spirit could characterize the relation of every church and pastor.

—"Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples" is the title of one of the books of the Bethany C. E. Reading Course, prepared by Froderick D. Power, pastor Garfield Memorial Church, Washington, D. C., just from the press of Fleming H. Revell Publishing Company, Chicago, New York and Toronto. No one need be afraid of this book on the score of soundness, according to our plea. It is decidedly a book on the elementary principles of the Christian religion as usually taught by the Disciplss of Christ and as true to the New Testament teaching as were any of the sermons of the fathers. It begins with "Rightly Dividing the Word" and goes on down through the entire series of steps or degrees in the development of a New Testament Christian and a New Testament church. The chapters are short, plain, to the point and amply supported by a "thus saith the Lord." Our people cannot but be delighted with this book and certainly ought to see that it is widely circulated, and especially to see that it is both read and studied in the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses. If you have no such class in your church you should organize immediately and begin the excellent series of books prepared especially for this work.

—At our preachers' meeting in this office on last Monday 14 accessions were reported at the Compton Heights protracted meeting last week and 16 at the Fourth Church. At Compton Heights, city evangelist is assisting Pastor S. B. Moore. At Fourth Church Prof. Butler is assisting Pastor E. T. McFarland. Additions were also reported as follows: Carondelet, two; at First Church, one. D. N. Gillett, pastor Tuxedo Church read a plain sound paper on the sublime work of the preacher. A. McLean, of Cincinnati, O., was present on his return from the Springfield (Mo.) Endeavor Convention. Before leaving he propounded this question to our preachers who were present: "What is the cardinal thought, the underlying or basic principle, of this reformation?" To this the following answers were made by each preacher in writing, to wit: "The restoration of apostolic teaching and practice;" "The restoration of New Testament Christianity;" "A complete return to the teaching of Christ and his apostles;" "The unquestioning recognition of Christ's authority;" "The unity of God's people and the Restoration of the Bible to its proper place;" "The restoration of apostolic practice and teaching;" "The restoration to the world of the church in doctrine and in practice;" "The union of God's people on the Bible alone;" "To realize Christ's conception of the church," "The exaltation of Christ to the headship of the church;" "The restoration of New Testament Christianity." We give each preacher's answer that the reader may see the the underlying unity of mind on this important subject and the soundness of the Christian ministry in this city. The only question about these statements is whether any one of them reveals a distinct differentiating thought or principle to one not of our faith and order—anything that another religious body may not claim with equal sincerity and zeal? Think over this matter and find out where and how you stand on the subject.

—We have just learned of the death of Arthur F. Willett, in Dowagiac, Mich., last week. This was a sad message for a large circle of devoted friends, but those upon whom the deepest sorrow comes in this providence is the companion, the mother and the only remaining of three brothers, Prof. H. L. Willett. For each of these and the relatives we have the profoundest spmpathy, but they know in whom they trust, and from this unfailing source of strength and comfort their wants in this hour of sorrow will not go unsupplied. A more extended notice of his death and life will be given in the next issue of this paper.

—The following announcement is commended to your considration:

There will be a conference in Chicago, Thursday, December 21st, at 2 P. M., to consider starting a Bible Training School in this city. All who are interested are invited. Send names to the Christian Oracle, 358 Dearbon St., if entertainment is desired.

Your::: Trip to Paris has not yet reverted from a possibility to an impossibility.

Many energetic agents can earn enough money this Winter to pay for a trip abroad by securing subscriptions to and perhaps a good deal more.

The Ladies' Home Journal
AND
The Saturday Evening Post

At the end of the season (April 15th) we are going to divide $18,000 among 764 of our best agents.

This is in addition to liberal commissions on all subscriptions, and special rebates for large clubs.

The best agent will get $1,000, the next best will get $750, and so on.

Don't let 764 people outstrip you. But, if you should, the pay will be ample for all the work you do for us.

Write for particulars.

—We are glad to hear a good word about the ctures at the Bible College at Columbia. J. '. Monser has been giving some able lectures ı "Genesis," including some introductory pics such as "Tradition—Its Nature and earings upon History," "History of its aking and Proofs," "What Can be said for e Bible," etc. He had sixty students in his ass for the introductory lecture. Four lec- res are to be given each week—three by J. '. Monser and one by W. H. Winders. With e good work which is being done on the in- de and the able advocacy of the dean, W. T. oore, on the outside, the Bible College has a ood outlook.

—An essay read before the Christian En- eavor Society at Russell Chapel near Blakes- ırg, Ia., by Miss Vesta Smith, has been ceived. The essay is on "Neglect," and e writer points out the common faults of eglecting to speak the kind word, to perform e kind act, the neglect of personal piety and those opportunities and privileges which ild up character. Truly, "neglect" is one the greatest perils of the soul. "How can e escape if we neglect so great a salvation?"

—The short course in agriculture, given each inter at the State University, Columbia, o., has proven of almost incalculable value many farmers, and their use ought to be at- sted by a rapid increase in attendance each ssion. Few fields of labor offer more induce- ents or better rewards the use of knowledge an the farm, and these schools put men in ssession of facts, thus giving them in a few eeks what otherwise would require years of xperience. Any young man who could avail mself of this opportunity ought to send in his ame at once for the approaching term, begin- ng January 2nd. Address A. J. Waters, ean, Columbia, Mo.

—S. M. Martin wired us from Huntington, '. Va., Monday morning, as follows: "Thirty dded yesterday; 130 to date." Good for untington. In addition to this the following eetings are reported, more than we could get ı our evangelistic page this week: Scoville nd Huston, Akron, O., 17 additions on last unday; E. S. Allhands, Arkadelphia, Ark., vo additions; I. H. Fuller, Wapello, Ia , two aptisms; Flourney Payne, Denver, Col., 26 dditions since Jan. 8th, 11 in a recent meet- g; M. Hedge, Oskaloosa, Ia., 115 additions, . E. Cory, pastor; Melancthon Moore, eserve, Kan., one addition; W. T. Adams, ates Center, Kan., 17 additions to date; J. . Smith, Downing, Mo., 21 confessions; Iarion Stevenson, Decatur, Ill., six baptisms; Vm. Dunkleberger, near Ingalls, I. T., even additions; E. A. Bosworth, Morristown, ., two baptisms—public school teachers; . W. Yocum, Norcatur, Kan., six additions; . H. Graham and Prof. Hackleman, Worth- ngton, Ind., 19 additions — 29 in eight onths; A. M. Chamberlain and H. F. cLane, of Toledo, O., at Alliance, O., additions; R. W. Clymer, Scranton, Pa., additions; H. H. Peters, Rantoul, one ad- ition. We regret that we could not publish he particulars given of the above meetings in ur columns this week, but it is impossible. Ve shall give the leading items next week. very department in our paper is over the anks. Last week we had fifteen columns of natter in type left over, and nearly as much his week will have to stand over, besides full oxes of copy not yet in type. The CHRISTIAN- VANGELIST is booming.

—J. D. Forrest, of the University of Indian- polis, Ind., has had reprinted from the merican Journal of Sociology his very houghtful and suggestive paper on "The ontrol of Trusts," in form better suited for a ider circulation. To say that this paper is houghtful and suggestive, however, is but a ery mild expression of its merits, which to ppreciate fully should be read with care. Ve cannot, of course, enter into a discussion of he position of this paper in relation to trusts, but we cannot refrain from commending it to the attention of every voter possible. The paper classes trusts with labor-saving machin- ery and thinks laws to properly control them more wise than preventive measures. With their acknowledged dangers eliminated their stock will, in time, the author thinks, become widely distributed among small holders and the trusts thus, in time, belong to the people at large. The remedy suggested by the paper for a control of trusts is "a system of grad- uated income taxation by the national govern- ment with the rigid supervision of the accounts which such a system would necessitate." And this we state, not for discussion, but to whet your appetite for this particular morsel of literature on trusts, recently from the University of Chicago press, Chicago, Ill. Or address J. D. Forrest, Irvington, Ind.

—Your short editorial on what the ordinary church members answer to, "What must I do to be saved?" in a recent issue, ought to be printed in large, bold, clear type and hung up in every church in the country. I think it might startle some from their sinful security. May the Lord abundantly bless you in con- demning "spiritual wickedness in high places."

—McClure's Magazine for December begins a serial article from the pen of Rev. John Watson, D. D., on "The Life of the Master." This does not look like a decadence of the Christian religion. A great literary enterprise like McClure's does not deal with dead or dy- ing themes. The editors of this magazine in their apology for this serial article say that their intelligent constituency, looking to them for the best thought on all subjects, "realize that they could not neglect the domain of re- ligion." This new life of Christ from the pen of this noted and scholarly master of both pen and pulpit is to be unique in its treatment and purpose. It abounds in striking sentences and eloquent periods and promises to be one of the most fascinating, faith establishing, soul-sat- isfying stories of the Master's life since the days of the apostles. Here are a few sentences from the prologue:

As a rock standing out from the midst of a stream, so upon Jesus has the current of hu- man life and thought beat and broken from the first centuries to the nineteenth.

Whatever is pure and merciful and spirit- ual and unselfish in social life flows from his influence, and the very motives which regu- late our best deeds and to which we appeal in another man have been implanted by the un- seen hand of the Master.

If any one should have the heart to criti- cise the gospel of Jesus, he will find that the best person he knows is pursuing Jesus' ideal; and if any one had the audacity to deny that Jesus ever lived, he would the next moment touch the Master, living now, in one of his dis- ciples.

—The call for a council at the Palmer House, Chicago, for Dec. 21, I understand is an out- growth of a conference held at the Jubilee Convention in the interest of a proposed "School of Pastoral Helpers." I want to second the call and hope not only that many may attend, but that it may result in great good to the brotherhood. A. M. HARVUOT.

—The following message from G. W. Coff- man, Hurda, C. P., India, is deeply interest- ing. Such a contribution from one of our mis- sionaries so far away ought to put some of us to shame. When such an one in a distant land can do so much for our helpless preachers, what ought those of us at home to do for them. It will be observed that Bro. Coffman had not yet learned of the death of Bro. Atkinson. Then again do not fail to note the terrible famine prevailing there, of which others have written, and do something for their relief. The case is one of exceeding emergency and our hands should open at once to their wants:

DEAR BOR. ATKINSON:—I enclose an order on F C. M S. for $5.00 for Ministerial Relief. I do think it is too bad that more interest is not taken in our aged and helpless preachers. I do thank God for such courage and faith as you manifest in this work for the Master.

We are in the midst of a great famine here. Not only food, but water is becoming very scarce. Rivers and wells are now drying up. It is eight or nine months before the rainy season. I do not know what will become of the people. Sincerely,

G. W. COFFMAN.

—Sister R. M. Herron, of Lincoln, Neb., has forwarded us a letter which she received from Bro. A. M. Atkinson, in December, 1886, at the time of the inauguration of the work at Ann Arbor, Mich., showing the whole-hearted- ness as well as the large-mindedness of the man. She had written to several leading men in reference to the enterprise, and Bro. A.'s reply was specially encouraging. Following is the letter:

MRS. R. M. HERRON:

Dear Sister—Referring to yours of the 9th I thank you sincerely for thinking me worthy to share with you in the thoughtful considera- tion of our Lord's cause at Ann Arbor, and I now assure you that it will give me pleasure as far as possible to aid you and other "willing ones" in the work you have undertaken. I have read with interest your letter to our very dear Bro Radford concerning this work, and am sure that you will find in him a "true yoke- fellow" in the gospel. I shall expect to hear of your success in doing much good at Ann Ar- bor. You will do well to write to Bro. R. Moffett at Cleveland, stating the "situation," etc.

I hope to see you at "Bethany in August, and to know you better. The Lord bless you.

Yours sincerely,

A. M. ATKINSON.

Clubs Rates for Churches.

In order to meet a request that has come to us from a number of churches that desire to circulate the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST more ex- tensively in their membership, we have decid- ed upon the following

SPECIAL OFFER FOR 1900.

To churches that raise a special fund for the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in their congregation and community we will send the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST for 1900 at the rate of $1.00 per copy on the following condi- tions:

1. The club must consist of not less than 50 names.

2. The papers will be sent to one address, to be designated by the church and to be dis- tributed as the church may direct.

3. The cash must accompany the order.

4. The paper sent under this offer will be discontinued at the end of the year 1900 unless otherwise ordered.

For a less number of subscribers than that above named a special rate will be granted on application to this office.

Address all communications to Christian Publishing Co., 1522 Locust St.

PERSONAL MENTION.

G. V. Devol is in a protracted meeting in Clarksville, Iowa.

W. B. Rose recently held a good protracted meeting in Dixie, Wash.

R. E. Rosenstein has accepted a call to the church in Manhattan, Kan.

Chas. E. Powell has accepted a call to the church in Ocala, Fla.

Thos. G. Nance is now in a protracted meeting in Valley Mills, Tex.

Milo G. Cummings and Miss Pearl Wiley are now in a protracted meeting in Grenola, Kan., with fine prospects of success.

K. W. White, of Glasgow, Mo., writes that he preached the sermon at the Armstrong union Thanksgiving services.

Clark Bateman and his wife, Monticello, Iowa, were recently given a hearty reception by the church and its friends.

To those who have inquired we reply that the address of G. W. Moore is Cortland, Trumbull Co., Ohio.

One of the largest meetings reported this week is that held by A. E. Cory, in Oskaloosa, Ia., of which church he is the esteemed pastor.

John J. Higgs, Coruna, Ind., wants to secure a singing evangelist for a meeting commencing Jan. 7, 1900. Enclose stamp when you write.

J. W. Lowber is now delivering a course of lectures at Add Ran University, on "The Influence of Greek Philosophy upon Civilization."

The church in Waxahachie, Texas, has passed resolutions of appreciation for the services of E. H. Kellar, and of regret at his departure, for a tour of the world.

B. W. Salmon writes that he has now accepted work for the church at Erie, Illinois, to begin January next. He is now at Rolling Prairie, Indiana.

H. A. Northcutt's meeting at Marshall resulted in 86 additions to the church. Brother Northcutt testifies to Bro. Wharton's high Christian life and work as pastor of the Marshall church.

F. W. Emerson has closed his work at Holton, Kan., and begins with the First Church of Topeka, Dec. 1st. He reports the church in Holton in good shape and ready for a good pastor.

Elmer T. Davis closes his work for the First Church, Kansas City, Kansas, Feb. 1st. Churches wishing his services are requested to address letters to 735 Cheyene St., in above-named city.

H. E. Ballou, Winchester, Kansas, requests us to say that he did not marry a white girl to a negro as reported in the daily press, but on the contrary positively refused to do so, as did all the ministers in that town.

A message by wire from Scoville and Huston, Akron, O., on Monday morning, reports 17 addition on Sunday, and that scores of people were turned away from the building for want of room.

B. S. Denny, Iowa state secretary and Evangelist W. J. Dodge recently dedicated a new house of worship for the church in Ft. Dodge, Iowa, in the midst of an inclement season of weather. There was a good audience, a good sermon and a good collection, the bad weather notwithstanding, and the brethren are happy in their new home.

The Gallatin Auxiliary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, the first Lord's day in December, 1899, passed resolutions of sympathy and love for their beloved brother and former pastor, E. B. Redd, in the great loss he has sustained in the loss of his beloved wife, Sister Kate Redd, whose tragic death is related in our obituary columns this week.

R. F. Thrapp, of Pittsfield, Illinois, writes that much evangelistic work is being done in their country this winter. Meetings held and planned as follows: W. E. Spicer, at Detroit; F. M. Hays, at Time; J. D. Dabney, at New Hartford; T. W. Cottingham, at Chambersburg; A. P. Cobb, at Barry, and J. V. Coombs, at Pittsfield. Bro. Coombs begins Dec. 31.

Bro. G. L. Wharton spent Lord's day, Dec. 10th, in Bethany, W. Va. He made three inspiring addresses. He spoke at the morning service, at a joint meeting of the Junior and Intermediate Societies in the afternoon, and in the evening, under the auspices of the auxiliary of the C. W. B. M. In response to an appeal made by Bro. Wharton 26 new members were added to the roll of the C. W. M.

D. N. Wetzel, of Richland Center, Wis., writes us that they will dedicate their new house of worship Dec. 17. All the brethren of the neighboring churches are cordially invited to attend the services.

H. H. Peters has decided to remain with the Rantoul Church another year. He has been there two years The work is prosperous. He preached the Thanksgiving sermon in Gifford and the same evening lectured at Beulah on "The Fruit of the Saloon."

Mr. Barclay Meador, who for the past seven years has been officially connected with the St. Louis Young Men's Christian Association, resigned November 30th, to accept the position of advertising manager of the Christian Publishing Company. During his long and honorable career in the St. Louis Association, Mr. Meador has filled various positions with singular fidelity and uniform success, and has made for himself and the Association a host of friends, who will unite in wishing him abundant success in his new position. We are gratified to report that Mr. Meador will continue his active interest in the Association as a volunteer worker.—Manhood, Y. M. C. A., St. Louis.

We are glad to quote the above from the organ of the Y. M. C. A. of this city, and to introduce Bro. Meador to our readers as our advertising manager. We have known him as an earnest Christian worker for many years, and it is with no little pleasure that we announce his connection with us as a member of the Christian Pub. Co.'s staff of workers. Our patrons can rely implicitly upon all his representations and be assured of fair dealing.

A Great Opportunity for the Disciples of Missouri.

Is it not true that ability is the measure of responsibility? Is it not also true that opportunity is often only another name for ability? What, then, shall I say of the responsibility of the Disciples of Missouri, as regards the endowment of the Bible College, at Columbia. They certainly have both the ability and opportunity for the permanent establishment of the greatest educational enterprise which they have ever undertaken. Will they meet this responsibility as becometh a noble and generous brotherhood?

It is proposed to raise $100,000 as an endowment fund. This will be amply sufficient for all practical purposes. We can succeed if we get $50,000. This sum is regarded by the board as the minimum mark at which to aim, consequently all pledges for endowment are taken with the understanding that this sum must be raised before it is safe to erect a building on the lot which has been secured. This shows how carefully and wisely the board is moving. We have college buildings in nearly every state in the union as monuments to our zeal without knowledge. We want to be sure at Columbia that we have an endowment fund equal to the requirements of a reasonable success before any effort is made to erect new buildings. Fifty thousand dollars will be sufficient to make our success certain, and consequently that has been fixed as the minimun sum to be raised at once. But we must have a great success. Hence, $100,000 will be required in order to reach satisfactory results

This is a paltry sum compared with wha would be necessary to raise if we should undertake to equip a university that would compete with our State University. Such a univer sity would require five or six millions of dollar and this, at present, at leat, is an impossibl ideal.

What, then, is the best thing for us to do Undoubtedly we should at least raise the $100, 000 necessary to enable us to secure, for Bibl instruction, all the benefits of our State Uni versity. Nor should the brethren of Missou delay a single week in furnishing the whol amout required for this purpose. There neve was a more imperative call than this one of th Bible College. What answer will the brother hood give?

No one need pay (now) anything more tha the interest on the amount pledged. Our pla leaves the money invested in the hands of th donors, and this secures them against a pos sible loss, if the enterprise should fail. Bu it must not and will not fail. "If God be fo us, who can be against us?"

I regret I cannot personally visit all th brthren in the state. I should be glad to d this on my own account; but my time is limit ed. What is done must be done quickly.

Brethren of Missouri, this is your work! I is your responsibility! It is your opportunity Will you not take up the matter at once, an in some way give it a helping hand? If yo cannot subscribe largely, send me such con tribution as you can give. These smaller gift will help to meet current expenses. If, how ever you can give $100 or upwards in notes as I have indicated to be paid at your optio within a reasonable time (said notes bearing interest from the 1st of January, 1900), the kindly drop me an intimation to that effect, and I will at once send the form of note to be filled in and signed. I hope to hear from hundreds of brethren with respect to this important matter. W. T. MOORE.

Organized for Work.

A county meeting of Marion county, Ill., was held at Odin, Nov. 28, 29. The object o the meeting was to organize the county fo missionary work to conform to the district an state organizations. The meeting resulted i a permanent organization with J. F. Ros borough as president. The attendance wa good and the deliberations were harmonious and pleasant. Eleven preachers were present. We hope to induce every church in the county to co-operate in the work of saving our weak churches and evangelizing the county.

COFFEE THE CAUSE

OF HEART TROUBLE.

"Three cases of heart trouble that have been relieved by stopping coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee, have come under my notice. First, my own case. I suffered greatly from palpitation and irregularity of the heart. My physician ordered me to leave off coffee, and when I took up Postum Food Cofee in its place, the heart trouble was soon entirely cured, and I find the Postum to be just as the doctor said, 'not only harmless, but very beneficial.'

"A gentleman friend had much the same trouble with his heart. I suggested that he try Postum. After the first cup at breakfast he said, 'I don't want any more of it.' Inquiry proved that it had not been properly boiled, so I prepared a cup for him strictly according directions, and he pronounced it 'delicious' and 'better than coffee.' Mrs. ———, of Paducah, suffered much the same way, and has had the same experience in recovering from heart trouble by the discontinuance of coffee and taking up the use of Postum. For private reasons I request that you withhold my name from publication." ———, Princeton, Ky.

ON THE BIGGEST SHIP ON EARTH.

Occasionally I like to locate in the minds of my kind readers the spot where I write my letter of any particular date. It may interest some to know that I pen these paragraphs on the Oceanic, during the last few hours of my return voyage to England. As the mighty and marvelous steamer is 704 feet long and 68 feet wide it has had no rival since the construction of Noah's Ark. We have been seven days on the sea. The passage has been rough and stormy for the most part, until this last day when we neared the Coast of Ireland. The Emerald Isle is bathed in sunshine and we have been looking with admiration from the deck on her beautiful marine edging of green hills. At Queenstown, as the sun was setting in a sea that caught its glory, and only slowly quenched them in its smooth expanse, we landed a contingent of Irish passengers, and now as night darkens we are steaming on for Liverpool. Heavy gales and great seas have had little effect on our leviathan craft. The captain, Commander Cameron, says that any other ship in the world would have constantly been under water all over its decks; but the Oceanic sublimely looked down on the vast billows and only caught their spray. Its roll is leisurely and gentle; it pitches with stately calm This ocean queen is the symbol of majesty in the fury of the storm. This voyage will be memorable for the company enjoyed by us. By the pronoun "us" here employed understand me to mean a little company of four. This quartet consists of Bro. Spring, myself, my wife and my daughter. We have amongst the passengers a band of 15 missionaries, going from America to India and Africa. These gracious men and women have won our hearts. They belong to various missions and societies. All seem profoundly consecrated. All are young, and all are going for the first time to their spheres.

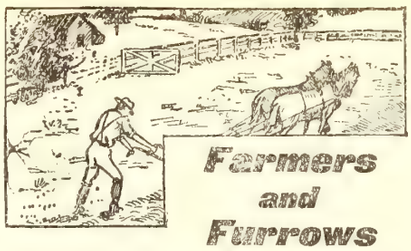
WORSHIP AT SEA.

When the sailors had "rigged church" on Sunday morning quite a goodly congregation gathered in the beautiful saloon. It fell to my lot to conduct the worship. Of course, I had to play the clergyman, as the Church of England form of prayer is compulsorily used. Bro. Spring preached a sweet and gracious sermonette on the text, "Have faith in God." It was listened to with close attention. Wherever he goes E. H. Spring impresses on those about him the influence of his delightful personality. He is a singularly enjoyable traveling companion. Our fellowship together during this American tour has been perfectly charming. There were graceful and estimable people of different nationalities on board. Of course, all are not so. I have compared this Oceanic to Noah's Ark. Well, that colossal craft carried clean and unclean creatures. So does this Oceanic. There are gamblers and drinkers on board, who have no souls above the smoking room, which they turn into a sort of stye, playing cards all day till late at night, and incensing each other in reeking clouds which never disperse. But I am thankful to say that this carnal contingent is on this occasion unusually small. The Oceanic carries 10,000 bottles of beer, but that beverage is not consumed in the quantities I had expected.

"SOMETHING IN THE ENGLISH, AFTER ALL."

Last night we had a concert on the Oceanic. It was for the benefit of the Liverpool and New York Seamen's Orphan Schools, and was a success, as such occassons generally are on these lines. We took our parts and did our best. Bro. Spring was asked to give a reading. I was requested to occupy the chair and to make a speech. I mention the occasion because of the subject of a recitation given by an American gentleman from Chicago. The poem he repeated produced a fine effect. It appeared recently from the pen of a young American poet, in the Chicago Tribune, and was entitled "There's Something in the English, After All!" I have never heard a more stirring tribute to my country and its people. As the poem of Mr. Bertrand Shadwell is copyrighted in America I may not quote more than a fragment, but I give the last verse:

"If you're ever on a sinking ship, O then I know you'll find
That there's something in the English, after all;
There's no panic rush for safety, where the weak are left behind
(For there's something in the English, after all):
But the women and the children are the first to leave the wreck,
With the crew in line, as steady as a wall,
And the captain is the last to stand upon the reeling deck;
So there's something in the English, after all."



I must acknowledge that I was surprised as well as touched at the vociferous applause elicited by the recitation of this poem, especially as the majority of the audience were genial Americans. Only a small minority were English. Even the Germans and Scandinavians appeared anxious to testify to their appreciation of this enconium. We English people have ever been accustomed to the reception of vials of abuse from cosmopolitan critics, and the meekness with which the average Briton has endured world-wide admonition has tended to lapse into indifference. The English people are disliked on the Continent, I know well enough. But why? Not because there is no good thing to be found in the English nation, but because for nearly a thousand years England has never tolerated the tread of a conqueror, while to-day her navy sweeps the seas, and her commercial fleets defy the competion of all the earth.

ABOUT THE ENGLISH WORK.

It is cheering on landing at Liverpool, after writing the above paragraphs on the Oceanic, to be lovingly greeted by dear and faithful brethren on the shore. Our brothers Brearley, Bates, Bicknell and Wrathall were at the landing-stage early in the morning to exchange salutes with us as we leaned over the towering bulwarks of the ship. We were informed that in the eventide of the day a "grand rally" was to be held of our Liverpool and neighboring churches—Birkenhead, Chester, Southport, etc., to hear from Bro. Spring and myself a report of the Cincinnati Convention and of our impressions of America. We shall enjoy this meeting to-night under the auspices of Bro. and Sister Bicknell and the church at Parliament St., Liverpool. Thus our homecoming is welcomed. This letter I may conclude by a cheering reference to the beautiful work being done at this juncture by Bro. Bicknell and his wife, and the Liverpool workers. Our devoted brother has done an unusual thing with unusual results. He has undertaken to hold a protracted meeting under the conviction that the district might be effectually evangelized by himself as minister resident, without waiting for an outside evangelist to be brought at considerable expense. During the first fortnight in November the pastor of Parliament Street has carried on an earnest campaign, preaching on Redemption, Pardon, Baptism, etc., and using a fine lantern every evening. No fewer than 39 additions to the church membership have constituted the work of this effort. I say that it is unusual for the resident minister of a church to make such an attempt.

It is still more unusual for it to be done with success. But Bicknell is a successful man. He has in two and one-half years nearly trebled the membership of the church in Liverpool. He is an Indiana man, who last labored at Benton Harbor, Michigan, on the other side. Sister Bicknell is from Nebraska. I saw evidences that she is a shining light in church and home. A bright minister's wife is an incarnate sunbeam scattering darkness on all sides as she moves through the sphere of her husband's service. W. DURBAN.

Farmers and Furrows

A farmer is known by his furrow as "the carpenter is known by his chips." It takes a firm hand and a true eye to turn a straight furrow. No wonder the farmer wears out, spite of exercise and fresh air. One day's work on the farm would tire many a trained athlete. And the farmer works hardest of all. The first up and the last to bed, feeding his team before he feeds himself, his work is practically never done. Why does not the farmer treat his own body as he treats the land he cultivates? He puts back in phosphate what he takes out in crops, or the land would grow poor. The farmer should put back into his body the vital elements exhausted by labor. If he does not, he will soon complain of "poor health." The great value of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is in its vitalizing power. It gives strength to the stomach, life to the lungs, purity to the blood. It supplies Nature with the substances by which she builds up the body, just as the farmer supplies Nature with the substances that build up the crops.

"I write to tell you of the great benefit I received from the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery," writes Mr. G. B. Bird, of Byrnside, Putnam Co., W. Va. "It cured me of a very bad case of indigestion associated with torpid liver. Before I began the use of 'Golden Medical Discovery' I had no appetite; could not sleep nor work but very little. The little that I ate did not agree with me, bowels constipated, and life was a misery to me. I wrote to Dr. Pierce giving the symptoms, and asked for advice. He advised me to try the 'Golden Medical Discovery' so I began the use of it and after taking four bottles I felt so well that I went to work; but soon got worse, so I again began the use of it and used it about eight weeks longer, when I was permanently cured."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets invigorate stomach, liver and bowels. Use them when you require a pill.

Braden and White Debate.

Having listened four days and nights to the debate at Alma, Illinois, between Clark Braden and I. N. White, together with about twelve of our preachers present, I desire to say that the debate has been a crushing defeat of the claims of Mormonism, and a triumph for the Bible. During the past sixteen years Clark braden has investigated Mormonism and spent hundreds of dollars in collecting books, pamphlets and documents on the subject. For years Mormons have confessed their dread of him by adding to their challenges and acceptances of challenges in scores of instances, the proviso: "Any one except Clark Braden." They have urged as reasons for such proviso that Clark Braden is not endorsed by Christian Churches, and that he is abusive in debate. No other man has ever been endorsed so many times and so broadly by Christian Churches as Clark Braden to meet Mormons and other forms of infidelity. The debate at Alma was positive proof of Braden's power and Mormon weakness. I. N. White refused to repeat the debate with him in Independence, Mo., upon the same conditions that he debated with him in Alma. We regard this as virtually admitting his defeat. I advise our brethren to send for Braden when they want the Mormons routed. G. W. TATE.

International S. S. Series.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., Nov 25, 1899.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST:—I am afraid a false impression will arise from the question of Bro. Jay E. Adams in the issue of Nov. 23rd concerning the abandonment of the International Sunday-school Lessons. No action was ever taken by the San Antonio church or Sunday school looking toward such abandonment. Upon numerous occasions, however, the pastor and all but one or two of the teachers agreed in their public criticism of the International Lessons. It is but fair to say that the only reason we have not abandoned them is the lack of something better or as good.

Theoretically, the International Lessons may appear to many as to the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, "a glorious outline of study, not to be improved upon anywhere by any system of Bible study." But in practical operation the system often approaches the ridiculous. According to the theory this is the fault of the teachers and scholars. But to borrow Mr. Cleveland's epigram, "It is a condition and not a theory that confronts us," in interesting old and young alike in Bible study, in conveying, through the Sunday-school sessions of an hour and a half, weekly, a general knowledge of the way into the kingdom. I think the assumption that this university plan is followed up and religiously adhered to by the average school is not warranted by the facts. The lessons of the last half of this year furnish an illustration of the unsatisfactory range of the lessons To get the proper grasp upon the aim of the committee in this series necessitates close work upon the most studious, and often study results in confusion and entanglement to those who have limited time and means to pursue the suggested and necessary investigations.

True, this criticism does not apply to the lessons for 1900, nor could we have found fault with the series in Acts a few years ago. Yet, the fact remains, I think, that for every one year of well-selected and profitable lessons there are two that are so "hop-scotchy" as to be devoid of interest and almost profitless.

As we are all agreed upon the advantage and interest of the coming lessons, it would seem that this little impromptu discussion is out of place. But it affords me opportunity to express a conviction that has not absolutely demanded publicity, though entertained for a number of years. I think in our sweetness of spirit, and anxiety for union, in the natural revulsion from the old time belligerency of the extremists of the conservative school, we approach dangerously near the maudlin sentimentalism that suggests an emasculated gospel. To my mind the fact that we have, as a people, walked step by step with the "religious world" is not conclusive proof that we have gained thereby. And the query suggests itself, if, with all these years of active evangelism, we had steadfastly and systematically taught the "apostolic gospel" in our Sunday schools, would not our impression upon the "religious world" have been even greater than is recorded this Jubilee Year?

I am a preacher of union, and an advocate of interdenominational fellowship, yet I don't think we ought to do all the union-ing, and I certainly should prefer a non-denominational fellowship, upon a strictly apostolic basis. The mere fact that we work together is no proof that we are doctrinally stronger or the "religious world" doctrinally weaker.

Do me the kindness to set the San Antonio church and Sunday-school right before CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST readers. We have not abandoned the International Lessons, but if they hadn't mended their ways we should have done so ere this And whenever the San Antonio congregation cannot profitably use them we may yet take the deprecated action.

GEO. B. RANSHAW.

[Referring to the foregoing we have to say:

1. That it is certainly a good reason for not having changed the International Lessons for something else, which Bro. R. gives namely, that there was nothing better or as good to take its place. As long as this state of things exists a change would certainly be unwise.

2. It is hardly fair to blame any series of lessons because of the failure on the part of the teachers. There is no doubt great failure here, but that would be equally true of any series of lessons requiring intelligence and study, and any series that would not require such study would not be likely to promote biblical knowledge. We venture to say that there is a well-defined plan underlying the selection of the lessons for the last half of the present year, though it may not have been the very best plan. It was not an attempt to study the books from which the lessons were taken, but to present a consecutive history of Israel, beginning just before the captivity, describing their condition in captivity, and containing some lessons from Ezekiel, the prophet of the captivity, their return to Jerusalem, rebuilding of the walls, restoring the worship, with some of the psalms used in connection with the temple service. An exhaustive study of these books would have required so much time that the history would have been lost sight of.

3 We hardly see the application of Bro. R.'s remarks about the danger of "maudlin sentimentalism," and an "emasculated gospel." If we were called upon to sacrifice any principle or eliminate any part of the gospel in order to study the same Scripture lessons along with our religious neighbors, there would be force in what he says. But Bro. R is altogether too well posted to believe any such thing, and he is too irenic in his spirit and temper to object to this slight manifestation of Christian unity when it falls into such harmony with our own plea for unity. If other religious bodies can afford to let us "do all the union-ing," we ought not to object to our lot in this respect. The religious body that does the "union-ing" in the 20th century is the one that is to forge to the front as the vanguard of a conquering host.—EDITOR.]

Texas Letter.

The Scoville-Houston meeting, spoken of in my last letter, closed on Nov. 20 with 116 additions. The meeting was a success, both in numbers and in spiritual uplift, and the prayers of our people follow these faithful servants to their next field of labor, Akron, O.

I have found it impossible to take care of my large pastorate of 1,000 members and do justice to the business management of the Christian Courier, and have given up the paper. It goes back into the hands of W. K. Homan, who has so long been connected with it, and it is hoped that it may grow and become a mighty power for good.

John Logan leaves Texas for Kansas City. He goes there to make that city his headquarters while he does evangelistic work in the regions round about. It gives me pleasure to say that Bro. Logan is a very strong man, a fine gentleman and a successful evangelist. The churches should put him to work and keep him at it, for he is both worthy and competent.

P. T. E. Hilison, one of our colored preachers, died in Taylor, Tex., Oct. 11. Bro. J. W. Marshall, our Taylor pastor, says of him: "He was a man far above the average in intellectual power and his piety was never questioned by any one. He had a clear record. He had an abiding faith in God, and has gone from earth to reap the reward of the faithful."

J. L. Andrews, one of our evangelists, has taken unto himself a wife, who is a fine singer, and she is to aid him in that important department of his work. Congratulations. Would it not be well for others to imitate this example?

Poor Dewey! He finds it harder to stem the tide of American criticism than to sink the fleet of Spain. Under the combined fire of forts and fleet he was calm and manly, but this fusillade of criticism excites him and makes him act like a weakling. It seems to settle that old question we used to discuss in our juvenile debating societies, that the pen is mightier than the sword. A correspondent in the Dallas News, it seems to me, puts the whole question in a nutshell. He says: "It is a monumental piece of bad taste, and the later transfer to the Admiral's son has not helped the matter. The public, that was liberal enough to educate the Admiral, emotional enough to go crazy over his successful manipulation of a supreme opportunity, generous enough to give him a home, which he was weak enough to accept and foolish enough to part with in less than a month, is yet considerate enough to remember his public service, and regard him as wiser in disposing of an enemy's fleet than disposing of a friendly gift. The briefest explanation of the episode is that the Admiral is 62 years old and greatly in love."

"The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900," by W. W. Dowling, is a worthy successor of the splendid volumes preceding it. Bro. Dowling, like good wine, grows better with age. He has fairly won and will therefore, hold a high place as an expositor of the Sunday-school lessons. This book should have a large sale.

"Some Latter-day Religions," by Geo. H. Combs, of Kansas City, Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago, is a timely book. The author, though young, is one of our foremost men. His style is nervous, forceful and elegant. He is a student of wide research and keen discrimination. Antiquated theologies and out of-date questions have no charm for him, but the living issues of the day are his delight. The table of contents shows this: "Æstheticism," "Theosophy," "Otherism," "Faith Cure," "Pessimism," "Agnosticism," "Materialism," "Spiritualism," "Liberalism," "Mormonism," "Christian Science," "Socialism." If the merits of a book were a security for a large sale, this book would be sure of a wide circulation. M. M. DAVIS.

New York Letter.

The Rev. Dr. S. B. Rossiter, who for twenty-six years has been pastor of the North Presbyterian Church at Ninth Ave. and 32nd St., has resigned in order to accept the American secretaryship of the McAll Mission. The McAll Mission in France was founded in 1872 by the Rev. R. W. McAll. Its object is "the spiritual enlightenment of France." The American McAll Association has headquarters in Philadelphia and auxiliaries in sixty cities in different parts of the country. Mrs. Charles H. Parkhurst is its president and Mrs. James A. Garfield its first vice-president. The American side of the work is chiefly financial, raising funds for the support of the mission work in the French Republic, where its good influence has spread until the work is successfully carried on in forty-three cities outside of Paris. This is the first time the New York branch of the McAll Mission has had a resident secretary in this city, and it is believed such an officer will do much toward the material advancement of the work.

"The Metropolitan Forward Movement" of this city has just celebrated its seventh anniversary in a great meeting, at which Dr. Billing, of the Mount Morris Baptist Church, and Dr. G. P. Eckerman made addresses on the essetial features of the work, and the Rev. Dr. S. P. Cadman, chief pastor of this work, made a report. His report showed that during his four years' pastorate at the Metropolitan Temple thirteen hundred members have been received into its fellowship. When he took up the work there were less than one hundred members, now there are over thirteen hundred. This is all the more remarkable in view of the fact that it is a down-town church, below what is called "the spiritual dead line"—Fourteenth St. The secret of it is "an open church." The Temple alone maintains fifty meetings every week. On one Sunday in November more than eight thousand people attended the services of the parishes at all the different churches, some four or five in number. The devotional services of the week are largely attended, and the social life of the church is kept up by the Chautauqua Circle, the Literary Clubs and public receptions. The Forward Movement is doing splendid service in the overcrowded section of the city, where its good work is carried on, and the outlook for its future is bright with promise. Many of our dying down-town churches might renew their usefulness in their communities and enjoy once more their old-time vigor by employing some of the Forword Movement methods.

Some people who do not appreciate the simplicity in Christ fancy that elaborate ceremonialism is a panacea for almost all church troubles, and those who tire of congregational government evidently think that all troubles are easily, quickly and satisfactorily settled by placing matters of polity in the hands of a bishop, a presbytery or a conference. A little observation, however, will convince one of the falsity of such a conclusion. The Rev. B. F. DeCosta, who recently resigned from the Episcopal Church of St. John the Evangelist, on account of the victory of the Broad Church faction in the diocesan convention of New York, on the question of ordaining Prof. Briggs, was a few days since received into the Roman Catholic Church. Dr. DeCosta opposed the ordination of Dr. Briggs, but he says this is not the whole of the trouble. The difficulty, he claims, stands related to the whole Episcopal Church system. He also says there are many others who would take a similar step if only the bread and butter question could be settled. The stipend of the best Roman parish priest in New York is only $800 per year. Dr. DeCosta is married and therefore not eligible to the priesthood, even at this salary. He expects to lecture and do literary work.

Again, Dr. S. D. McCoumell, a prominent rector of Brooklyn, has just attacked the bishops of the Episcopal Church, and virtually charges them with mismanagement of the $400,000 domestic mission fund entrusted to their hands. He charges them with knowingly employing "feeble ecclesiastics, offensive, dictatorial and supercilious;" of maintaining "low standards of uprightness, truthfulness and honesty," and of supporting a "cowardly consistency that stands by recognized mistakes and does nothing to correct them." These are grave charges for the rector to make against the house of bishops. They are put forth in a vigorous article just published in the Churchman, the leading organ of their denomination. Doubtless the attack will be answered; but it illustrates the statement made before, viz, that smooth sailing is not always enjoyed, even with bishops to pilot the ship, and with an endless variety of religious performances going on all the time on board. Let us be satisfied with the simplicity in Christ.

The Rev. Dr. W. S. Crowe is preaching a series of discourses at the Church of the Eternal Hope, New York, on "The Seven Kinds of Religion in American History," which he divides into two sections—typical phases of Christianity in theory and practice, and characteristics of American Christianity and peculiarities of Christian people. His announcement of topics and sub-heads is interesting, to say the least. They are as follows: (1) Dogmatism: The Religion of Puritans; Salvation by Creed; Infallibility without a Pope; The Logic of Despair and the Spirit of Progress. (2) Emotionalism: The Religion of Methodists; Salvation by Grace, Wrath and Mercy; A Practical Mysticism. (3) Ritualism: The Religion of Catholics and Episcopalians; Salvation by Ordinances; The Beauty of Worship; Appeal to the Dramatic in Human Nature. (4) Optimism: The Religion of Universalists: Salvation by Kindness; Appeal to the Human Heart; The Golden Rule on the Judgment Throne; Can Faith, Hope and Charity be Overdone? (5) Rationalism: Religion of Unitarians: Salvation by Culture; The Divinity of Reason and the Sacredness of Ethics; Truth its own Authority and Character its own Heaven; Scholarship, Literature, Criticism; Democratic Principles with Aristocratic Habits. (6) Christian Science (or "Spiritism"): Salvation by Harmony; The Soul in Tune with God; A Revolt from the Materialistic Revolt (or Sweedenborg out-Sweedenborged) (7) Fraternalism (or the Salvation Army): Salvation by Personal Contact; A Gospel for the Submerged; Getting Down to the People. (8) Eclecticism: The Truths and Virtues of all Rounded up into the True Religion.

At the last meeting of the Disciples' Club, of New York, S. T. Willis read a paper on "The History of the Disciples of Christ in New York City," taking the ground that there were "good Disciples" in the metropolis, maintaining the ordinances and supporting the gospel before the influence of the Campbells ever reached this city or section. This position called out a vigorous discussion; but the paper was not torn into shreds, though it was assailed by strong opponents.

My Good Poems.

The name of my new book is "My Good Poems." This very modest title does not imply even half of the truth. I realize, however, that it is best to take an humble seat and afterwards be invited up higher. I can afford to wait a little.

Neither my wife nor children nor neighbors nor friends ever in any way suggested to me that it was my duty to write poetry. I found it out all alone The Muses became very clamorous and I wrote to quiet them. They say that they are now fully satisfied. It was only the young Muses who urged me to write. I could tell that they were young from the "pinfeathers" in their wings. Their flights are bold and strong.

My family and friends all say that they do not want to claim any of the great harvest of glory which my poems will produce, but that it shall all be my undivided property to possess and enjoy. Homer is dead, Dante is dead, Shakespeare is dead, but I am alive.

It can be shown that the great poets happen according to the great "periodical law" which is so famous in chemistry, and by the application of which they have discovered a number of new elements. This "periodical law" applies equally well to poets. After long and diligent labor in its application I have succeeded in locating myself comfortably among the greatest poets of the world. This is not vanity, for I can show its truthfulness by the application of the higher mathematics.

The author of My Good Poems shows that he is equally familiar with atoms, stars and all other parts of the universe. He marches through space with a flash of a meteor, striding from star to star, up and down, right and left, never once missing a foothold nor failing to grasp the proper star in the nick of time to secure his safety.

The reader of My Good Poems will be filled with amazement at the endless variety of subjects treated in the volume. They range from the Unseen Atom, through the Flea, to the Lost Pup, on the Irishman who left his Kerricter in Auld Oireland, thence to the Man of Words, and on and upward to the Stars, and, finally, to the whole Universe It will be seen that the author of My Good Poems is equally happy and skillful in the treatment of all subjects, both small and great. Whatever his theme his genius ever glows more and more with unabated fervor and gaandeur.

Owing to the elevation of temperature produced by the intense glow of the fires of genius in the book it will be necessary during warm weather, at least, to keep the volume in a refrigerator, in order to prevent spontaneous combustion. The insurance companies at a recent meeting decided to increase their rates on account of the presence of My Good Poems, unless it is kept cool by artificial means. A special incombustible paper prepared from asbestus will be used in preparing volumes at the trifling extra cost of $3 per volume.

My Drab Book contains all the great facts known to humanity, together with the only true philosophy of the universe. My Good Poetry gives in its inevitable style the poetic interpretation of the universe—known and unknown. The two are companion volumes. He who reads and understands them (things well-nigh impossible) will have the completest education. Civilization will travel in their wake. They will make the savage leap for joy and the civilized man laugh in his sleeve.

By their introduction even the Philippines can be readily subjugated. I now have a scheme on hand to that effect which I expect the government to adopt. Aguinaldo, with my Drab Book in his right hand and My Good Poems in his left, sitting on a stump with a cigar in his mouth, would be powerless to move until he had read and reread each volume many times. Our generals by a combined movement could then capture him. This will save bloodshed and ammunition.

In distributing My Good Poems the following rule will be strictly observed: First will be supplied the people of my own beloved state, Kentucky. After this a limited number of my personal friends—say 100,000—will be waited on. Then the various states of the Sunny South will follow in alphabetical order. Next the inhabitants of the great states and noble territories west of the Father of Waters; then the Central States, and on eastward through New York, and lastly, to the New England or Yankee States proper. Last of all will be supplied the city of Boston. The inhabitants of that city must remain content with their baked beans till they can be waited on.

You will be gratified to learn that the people of Kentucky, who are a most noble and generous people, have agreed to be content for several months with only 100,000 copies of My Good Poems, which is but a small fraction of the number to which they are entitled. They would not agree to make this sacrifice until they heard that I had doubled my contribution to missions

To furnish the above number for Kentucky will require nearly the total product of my great publishing company during one week. By means of increased facilities the company will be able to turn out on an average only about 1,000,000 copies per month during the first year. They expect to do better afterwards. It will be seen, therefore, that Christian patience will be necessary while awaiting your supply.

I extend to my publishers my cordial sympathy in their undertaking. On the rosy, dimpled cheek of the dear, sweet public I plant an affectionate kiss in genuine old Kentucky style.

Yours in joy and sorrow,

A. FAIRHURST.

Notes and News.

Our Marshall Revival.

Elder H. A. Northcutt's meeting continued just one month with 86 additions; 56 confessions. But I think fully equalling the ingathering has been the spiritual uplift of the church. Bro. Northcutt is a wonderful man of God, and I do not see how a church can get through a meeting with him and not be wondrously blessed. Why, it seemed to me at the conclusion of our meeting that the old Jerusalem church was more nearly reproduced than I ever saw it on earth before. "The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul," and "great grace was upon them all." Bitternesses that had sprung up, as they so often do, through some little misunderstanding, were done away and hands were clasped in forgiveness and love that were sundered for years. This I call a manifestation of the presence of the Spirit of God. Such a meeting strengthens the church, helps the pastor, betters our homes, betters our community, makes good men and women and cultivates all that is best in us. After his plain, faithful talks churches understand each other better than ever before, and yet there are no bitter feelings to be lived down, no harsh words to be explained away. But people of all churches have more love, and hence more of the Spirit of Christ in them. I like such meetings, and I love the man who lives so close to the Savior that he is inspired and fitted to hold such meetings. B. T. WHARTON.

Marshall, Mo., Dec. 5, 1899.

Some Missouri Items.

After a long silence I take my pencil to let your numerous readers know that I am still in the land of the living, working for the redemption of my fellowmen. Having to move from Nebraska in 1896 on account of the drouth, I located on a farm near Oregon, in Holt county, Mo. The churches in this section were all supplied with preachers, so I looked up some mission points, and found the Kerzon Station neighborhood to be a fit place to bestow missionary labors. I commenced a meeting there in the winter of 1896, and continued it four weeks, resulting in gathering together 32 members; 13 by primary obedience. I then gave them one-fourth of my time, doing the work of an evangelist, holding them another meeting last winter, resulting in nine additions, six by baptism. The last two years we have labored for them one-half time as evangelist, doing missionary work almost at our own expense, my family being the missionary society that sent us there. In October we held them another meeting, resulting in 13 anditions and the organization of a fellowship of the Church of Christ at Kerzon, with 55 members. On the second Lord's day in November they elected elders and deacons, and to day, the fourth Sunday, we appointed them by fasting and prayer and the laying on of hands, thus completing the organization to be known as the Christian Church at Kerzon, Mo.

This little band of consecrated Disciples are worthy the confidence of our great brotherhood, and it is to be hoped they will enroll themselves with the missionary movements of the same. I will continue to serve them as pastor one-half time, and hope to succeed in building a house of worship for them in the near future. We have one-half time that is subject to engagement, and can employ it with any congregation desiring our services.

I wish to express my approbation of the course of the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on the "fad" of higher criticism, and firmly believe with the Apostle Paul, that this word, "yet once more," implies the removal of "those things that are shaken, that those things that are not shaken shall remain." We will still have our Christ, our heaven, home and eternal life, and these are enough for me if all else is gone. And now, Bro. Garrison, as one that has read every issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST ever published, one that has stood by you from the beginning, I pray God's blessing to rest ever on your work for Christ. W. H. HARDMAN.

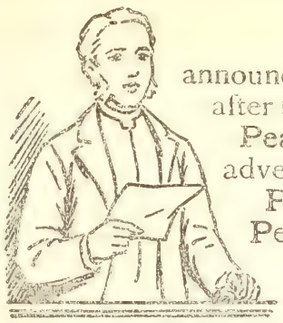
C. W. B. M. Work in Nebraska.

An auxiliary with a membership of eleven was organized at Peru, Neb., by Miss Olive Griffith, state organizer. There is a splendid outlook for a good society, as there are others who will be added to the present number.

District No. 2 held a successful covention at Elmwood, Neb., Nov. 8-10. C. W. B. M. session was Nov 9. Mrs. Maud Dungan talked of the Jubilee Convention. A pleasant and profitable program was enjoyed.



District No. 5 held its annual convention at Beatrice, Neb., 21-23. C. W. B. M. session was Nov. 22. One most helpful feature of the program was "A Model Auxiliary Meeting." "The Divine System of Profit and Loss" was the subject discussed. Papers discussing different phases of the subject were read by Mrs. Orpha Schell, Mrs. Dr. Jeffreys and Mrs. Wm. Oeschger. Mrs. A. S. Younkin, district manager, acted as president and Mrs. McClerey as leader.

Mrs. Alice Wickizer, of Beatrice, gave a most interesting and instructive map talk on our "Mission Points" and leading "Missionaries." In the evening address, "Awake unto Righteousness," she urged us as Christians and as C. W. B. M. workers to awaken up to the facts that there is yet much work to be done and that we are not awake to our full responsibilities. God grant as Christian workers we may no longer be asleep, but awake, wide awake, and ready to do more and more in the service of Jesus.

A Pastor announcing, from the pulpit, a committee to look after the cleaning of the building, called it "The Pearline Committee." That is the kind of advertising that has swelled the sales of Pearline. It's from people who know Pearline, and are using it, and who think and speak of it as the one thing necessary in any matter of cleanliness. Talk with some of these people if you have doubts about Pearline. 594

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

The school at Ridgeway moves along, but seeking something better asked that I visit them, and when it came to electing officers for the new year, the committee was chosen and the school ratified its action unanimously, and then the brethren very cheerfully gave to our support. Such homes as S. H. Coleman and Ellis Hopkins are always open to the Lord's servant.

Jameson and L. M. Brown gave hearty reception and ready co-operation in this work, the schools of the town joining ours in the chart work, in ordering charts of their own and in our support, so that my friend L. M. kindly handed the school apportionment in full to the worker. E. J. Gantz begins his sixth year with them.

The new church at Gallatin was thoroughly examined by the secretary, and it is most convenient and no mistake, and at the price is a marvel to all, but J. W. Alexander did it with his usual care in such matters, while he has never denied our work nor plead the new house, and so this year the school will give us the apportionment in full. Bro. Kerr opens the year with them very auspiciously.

John Giddens reports the house at Filley well under way, while M. H. Wood has done similar work at Ludlow, Douglas, so that we close our six months with eight new houses by the field force, costing $6,000, and the new schools, additions and institutes cannot be counted now. God is abundantly blessing us in the effort, and if the schools will only support the force all will rejoice later.

Perrin and J. T. Wingate are friends in need and deed. It was a bad night, I had just received the cold shoulder and was feeling a little blue, but it was gone in a twinkling when J. T. handed me more than apportionment, then took up an offering besides, and it was generous. But you see a Davis preaches for them, and he is one of the family that stands by your servant, too.

Elmer Shepard reports his work encouragingly and is not letting any time escape, determining to reach many of the needy communities and schools in his district; and this is to say that you will find a ready response to your call if you will write him immediately at 4238 N. 14th St., St. Louis. He aims to work Mississippi, Pemiscot and Dunklin right after the new year, and those in that region wanting his help ought to write immediately.

T. A. Hedges held four institutes during November, and appreciation of his work is seen in their giving to the work, while words of thanks have come to us from some of the schools. He is making his work as practicable as possible to the schools visited, just as would be expected, and it is resulting in some glorious reforms in some quarters, and this ought to go on for the entire year and will if the brethren will only be with us financially.

At Declow, Douglas, Brother Wood had 25 additions, and of the better people, all raising over $500 on the new house, so that in November he organized four new congregations and three new Bible-schools with forty additions.

As in the past, this is the month in which we appeal to all, especially the ministers, for help. Want to promptly pay the men for December, the Christmas week, but to do so we must have good remittances from the schools like Carrollton, Sedalia, Fulton, Paris, Nevada, St. Joseph, Maryville, Liberty, California and Chillicothe, while the smaller sums from others will enable us to bring joy and gladness into the homes of these faithful servants of God. Will you, please?

Let no school plan to rest for the remaining part of the winter, but show your devotion and zeal by your service for the Master. Let all holiday exercises tend to quickening interest in the Bible-school work. H. F. DAVIS.

THE C. E. READING COURSES.

A Model Conversion.

In Two Articles.

By F. D. Power, Director.

SECOND ARTICLE.

In our study of the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch, in a former article, we have seen the divine solicitude for this man as he journeyed on the highway, the part an angel took in effecting his conversion and the ministry of the Holy Spirit in his behalf. This brings us to the preacher's part.

He is sent after the one soul. We must never count anything wasted that is spent on one human being. The greatest mistake of many a minister is the neglect of individuals. Dean Swift began the service with only his clerk present: "Dearly beloved Roger, the Scripture moveth us——" Lyman Beecher preached a sermon to one man and converted him. Isaac Errett delivered a discourse to an audience of one and "the whole audience came forward," and confessed Christ. Jesus Christ gave almost all his supreme revelations to audiences of one, like Nicodemus and the woman at the well. Jesus was an individualist.

After Philip joined himself to the chariot we are told Philip opened his mouth, and beginning from this Scripture (Isa. 53:7), preached to him Jesus. The sermon is not given. It is simply said he preached "Jesus." So we read Philip went down to Samaria and "preached Christ unto them" (Acts 8:5). So Paul went down to Corinth and "earnestly testified that Jesus was the Christ" (Acts 18:5). The eunuch read. Philip preached. The eunuch was searching. The prayer of David was in his heart: "Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law" (Ps. 119:18). Philip declared the prophecies fulfilled in Jesus Christ. The eunuch hears and believes and is ready to obey. The love of the Man of Sorrows has conquered. He is anxious to accept him. "Behold, here is water: what doth hinder me to be baptized?"

Now we come to the eunuch's part. Why this question? Had Philip preached baptism? It is simply recorded that "he preached unto him Jesus." But he had never received instruction except from Philip, and in this one discourse. How, then, had he learned about the duty of being baptized, unless to preach Jesus involves full instruction in regard to this commandment of Jesus? Can men preach Jesus without preaching the ordinances of Jesus and the duty of self-surrender and loyalty to Jesus? Does not the gospel begin, historically, with the baptism of John, to which Jesus submitted, and conclude with the commission given by Jesus to his apostles, in which he declared, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved?" And in every sermon preached by these apostles, did they not enjoin obedience to this institution of the Lord Jesus?

What now? Some ancient authorities insert here, "And Philip said, If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest. And he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." This is in accord with Scripture. John said: "Every one, therefore, who shall confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 10:32). "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved: for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Rom. 10:8,9). Faith in the personal Christ, not faith in a system of human opinion, and humble surrender of the heart to his will, are all that God requires in order to baptism into Christ.

"And he commanded the chariot to stand still, and they both went down into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him. And when they were come up out of the water the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip; and the eunuch saw him no more, for he went on his way rejoicing."

Let a little child read this, and what will be its conclusion as to the action of baptism? How was the eunuch baptized? The descent from the chariot is not favorable to the notion that this man sprinkled, for that could have been done as well in the chariot as out of it. The going down into the water was still more unnecessary, if he was not immersed. They came up out of the water. All this would be an exceedingly useless proceeding, unless it is understood the eunuch was "buried with Christ in baptism." John Calvin says of this case: "Here we perceive how baptism was administered among the ancients, for they immersed the whole body in water."

Finally, "the eunuch went on his way rejoicing." Having done the will of the Lord he is assured of his approval and has the testimony of the Spirit that his sins are forgiven. He did not have this experience before, but after obedience. The Comforter has come, the gift of the Holy Spirit, and his fruits are love, joy and peace. It was so with the Samaritans when they "gave heed to the things spoken by Philip; there was great joy in that city" (Acts 8:8). It was so with the Philippian jailer when he and his believed and were baptized; "he rejoiced greatly with all his house" (Acts 16:34). Let us be sure that we are on the right way. If our way is not the rejoicing way it is not the right way. No better example can we find than the Ethiopian. Thus believing and obeying we must go on our way rejoicing.

The Franklin Avenue Church in Columbus will dedicate a new house Lord's day Dec. 17. F. M. Rains will officiate. This congregation is only 20 months old, but has a bright future before it from present indications.

NEBRASKA.

Harvard.—Our pastor, Bro. Samuel Gregg, has been preaching and F. H. Sweetman leader of song, in a meeting with the Harvard Church, beginning Nov. 12, closed Dec. 5; 13 added, church awakened and taking on new zeal. Bro Sweetman goes to Red Cloud.—CLEVELAND ELLER.

KENTUCKY.

Lexington, Broadway.—We have just closed a meeting resulting in 80 additions. There were 21 by letters, three from the Baptists, three restored and 54 by confession. The meeting was held without outside help. It has been a very helpful meeting to the church. This is the third meeting of the kind we have held in eight years.—MARK COLLIS.

OREGON.

Portland, Dec. 2.—Closed (Nov. 27) a meeting of 18 days at Clackamas with four confessions, one from Baptists, three otherwise and others are asking for letters to come with us. This is a mission and the result of this meeting is to double our forces with good prospect of another like increase in a few months. Bro. Skaggs gave us three sermons and will help again in January.—BRUCE WOLVERTON.

KANSAS.

Hoisington, Dec. 4.—We are very prosperous here. Four confessions yesterday; eight since Oct. 10. Bro. D D. Boyle will hold a meeting for us in February.—J. N. McCONNELL, minister Mound Valley, Dec. 4.—We closed at this place last night with a full house. They seemed to be eager to hear the plain, simple gospel of Christ. Many were convinced of the truth, but would not yield obedience to the gospel; 14 additions in all during the meeting, 13 baptized. I hope the revival will continue in the hearts of his children at Mound Valley. Pray for us.—J. P. HANER.

Anthony, Dec. 4.—Meeting closed at Sharon with 21 additions.—W. T. MCLAIN.

Jewell City, Dec. 3.—Sister Clara Hazelrigg closed a four weeks' meeting at Randall with 35 additions, and raised $1,000 to enlarge the church. She is now in the midst of a meeting at Jewell City with 30 additions to date. Tireless, devout worker and preacher. —LILLIAN FORREST, cor. sec.

Galva, Dec. 1.—Our meeting closed Nov. 21 with eight conversions, seven added to this church. The interest was splendid to the last, and we hope that other fruits are yet to come from the seed sown. I could hold a few other meetings this winter.—FRANK E. JONES.

Topeka, Dec. 1.—Thirteen added to the Central Ave. Church in November; two confessions, 11 by letter and statement.—FRANK ABRAM POWELL, pastor.

INDIANA.

Bedford, Dec 2.—Eleven added lately. Our work is in the finest kind of shape. God's good Spirit is with us and we are united gloriously in the work. Have just closed a four weeks' meeting for Bro. J. H. McNeill and our First Church at Muncie. There were 56 added in the meeting and four the next day but one, after the meeting closed; about 40 by conversion. Bro. McNeill is regarded as a strong man. His labors at Rushville before going to Muncie was crowned with wonderful success. His work at Muncie, though only well begun, is good. Bro. Myers, of the Central Church, was present often in the meeting. His spirit is delightful and his work is growing. He has lately taken unto himself a wife.—JAMES SMALL.

Ladoga, Dec. 4.—Wallace Tharp, of Crawfordsville, closed a 12 days' meeting for us on the 2nd with 54 additions; 44 by baptism. He is a fearless preacher of wonderful power and stirred the whole community.—W. T. BROOKS.

Evansville, Dec. 4.—One confession Nov. 26 and four confessions Dec. 3rd. God is working through his people. Personal work will build up any church. An earnest heart-to-heart talk with the unsaved is worth more than the most eloquent sermon. Personal endeavor is the secret of a prosperous, growing church. —W. A. BELLAMY, pastor.

Clinton, Dec. 4.—I held a short meeting at this place during the first days of the month with six additions. J. Walter Wilson, of Rushville, had charge of the music and proved himself a splendid leader and an exceptionally fine soloist.—O. E. KELLY.

CALIFORNIA.

San Jose.—One baptism and two confessions last Sunday. We had a glorious meeting.—B. B. BURTON, pastor.

ILLINOIS.

Kinmundy, Dec. 1.—State Evangelist C. H. Berry, just closed a meeting at this place of four weeks with 18 additions; excellent interest from beginning to the close. A strong effort is being made to have Bro. Berry locate with us. We hope to build next year.—E. C. BARGH.

Bryant, Dec. 2.—Closed three weeks' meeting here last evening with 17 additions; 13 by baptism, one restored and three from other churches. Will devote one-half time here.—W. W. MOISE.

Normal, Nov. 30.—Bro. B. F. Clay has just closed an interesting meeting here with 27 additions. Bro. Clay is an earnest, thoughtful preacher and will do any church good. Our work is in excellent condition.—E. B. BARNES.

Chicago.—There have been 25 additions to the West Side Church, Chicago, during the last seven weeks. This congregation now has 500 members and the outlook seems brighter than ever before.—BRUCE BROWN.

Windsor, Dec. 2.—We baptized two Nov. 29, one about 75 years of age, both heads of families. We preached the union Thanksgiving sermon at Atwood. Will continue the meetings at Atwood over next week. One addition last night and a good house. I will hold one missionary meeting the coming year.—A. HARRELL.

IOWA.

SCRANTON, Nov. 29.—R. R. Bulgin is assisting Bro. H. J. Aldrich in a meeting at Richland, N. Y. Bro. Bulgin's services as evangelist can be secured after January 1st. Write him at Scranton.

Arlinton, Dec. 1.—I have just closed my fourth meeting in Iowa, under the direction of the Northeast Iowa Board of Missions. Bro. S. T. Martin, of Mason City, is the efficient president and S. B. Ross, of Oelwein, secretary. They are good men, and have the cause of Christ at heart. B. S. Denny, corresponding secretary of state missions, rendered invaluable assistance. My meetings in order were Vinton, Iowa Falls, Melbourne and Volga City. The first two towns had no church, and very few brethren. The last two had small but discouraged bands, only one of them having a pastor—Melbourne. The result of work done was as follows: Two churches organized, with all the accessory auxiliaries; three pastors located, with their salaries raised before they were called; 189 persons were gathered from all sources; a new house is in process of construction at Venton, and will be ready for dedication by Christmas or before; money raised for all puropses, about $2,689. And now with such strong, faithful and enthusiastic young men as Nichols at Vinton, McCormic at Iowa Falls, Handsaker at Melborne and Fisher at Volga City, I feel that the work begun will be carried on to a successful termination. This work being finished, I am now at liberty to accept calls from churches anywhere. My time is taken for several meetings. Am now with W. M. Hollett, of this beautiful city, with fine prospects for a good meeting. My permanent address is Topeka, Kan.—D. D. BOYLE, evangelist.

MISSOURI.

Marshall, Nov. 30.—Eighty-four additions to date. Expect to close to-morrow.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Nevada, Nov. 27.—Two additions to the church at Richards yesterday; one confession and one by statement.—S. MAGEE.

Memphis, Nov. 28.—Meeting is now 11 days old, with 24 accessions to date; most of them by baptism. Three at our last service Prof. P. O. Powell is a splendid helper.—GRANVILLE SNELL.

Springfield, Nov. 27.—Seven added yesterday; 13 to date, and the meeting two weeks old. The interest grows and the outlook is hopeful.—D. W. MOORE.

Rock Port, Nov. 27.—On Saturday morning one of Atchison county's leading schoolteachers was baptized by the writer.—S. W. GLASCOCK.

Ravenswood, Nov. 27.—Meeting here three weeks old to-night; eight additions to date. The churches at Elmo and Ravenswood are both needing a pastor —H. W. CIES, evangelist.

Joplin, Nov. 27.—During November we received five additions to our congregation; one by confession. All the saloons and gambling places have been closed—really closed—for the past three Sundays in Joplin. Our Civil League is beginning to be felt.—W. F. TURNER.

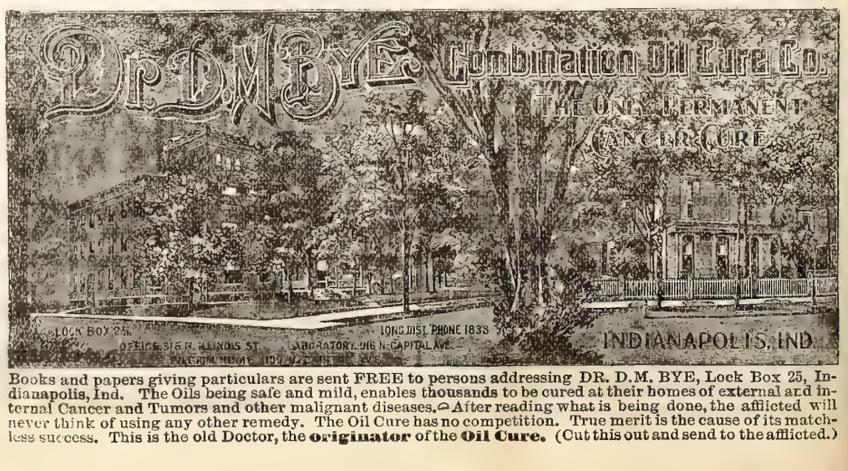
St. Louis, Nov. 27.—There were two additions to the Compton Heights Church yesterday. We are just beginning an evangelistic campaign. A. J. Marshall will join me to-night. We are hopeful of large results.—S. B. MOORE.

Nevada, Nov. 28.—Two accessions since last report. Accessions on each of the seven Lord's days just passed. Every department of the work is growing. Example: Average attendance for September, 103; October, 170; November, 213. Collection for September, $8 12; October, $17.76; November, $25.12. Prayer-meeting well attended. One hundred at the Christian Endeavor service last Sunday night, and from 500 to 700 attend preaching each Lord's day.—BEN F. HILL.

Memphis, Dec. 1.—Meeting two weeks old; 27 added to date, mostly young men and heads of families.—SNELL AND POWELL.

Knox City, Dec. 2.—In a good meeting with the church. Any church wanting a meeting or a regular preacher for part time, address me at Canton. Can furnish good references.—L. D. GOODWIN.

California, Dec. 1.—Our meeting continues over Lord's day. We have had 11 added and house crowded each night. Bro. C. C. Hill is one of our most talented preachers, and already he has the hearts of the people here.—C. E. MILLARD, singing evangelist.



Savannah, Dec. 1.—I served the congregation in Tarkio 16 months. During my work there 73 were added to the church. My work there closed with a three weeks' meeting held by home forces, in which 16 were added to the church; 12 of them by baptism.—A. R. HUNT.

The Lost Emigrants.

BY R. N. JOHNSON.

CHAPTER III.

Some weeks aboardship had now elapsed. The great West Indian Archipelago lay behind us. We were under the equator. The winds were still and we often lay becalmed—

"As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean."

The heat became so intense as to make all effort intolerable; and I, for the first time, questioned the wisdom of the lines of Read:

"You deep bark goes
Where traffic blows,
From lands of sun to land of snows;
This happier one,
Its course is run
From lands of snow to land of sun."

To the inmates of our sea prison—for such it was under the burning sun—the happier one would have been just the reverse of that of the poet.

Slowly, however, we drew away from the equatorial glare and heat, and one fine morning we found ourselves putting into the magnificent Harbor of Rio, to secure fresh food and water.

Many went ashore to receive new strength, Antæuslike, by a touch of mother earth. Among these was Doctor Andral. He was going up a narrow street from the wharf when he was rudely jostled by a party who, to use a nautical phrase, was evidently carrying too much sail.

One of them in a quarrelsome mood accused the Doctor of awkwardness and began to violently abuse him.

The latter, though a recognized leader in college athletics, being peacefully disposed, attempted to pass on; but not too soon to avoid a partially parried blow in the face. Angered on the instant, his arm was raised to strike, then recovering himself, he quickly moved away under a storm of epithets, among which "coward" was conspicuous.

Before making sail from Rio a new passenger came aboard, registering as "Col. Bird." I was by no means pleased when I afterwards learned of the trouble at Rio, just recounted, to find out that the leader in the quarrelsome attack upon the Doctor was the new passenger.

Under full sail the ship pushed steadily southward, and by the middle of November we were off the Falkland Islands.

Here we were met and spoken by the English brig, White Wing, on her way from Acapulco to Bristol. This was the last vessel we saw for many a day.

As we moved steadily away from the sun the deck became a less inviting resort for the passengers. The face of the sun was often obscured, and there were frequent dashes of wind and rain, with furious seas.

My father, though benefited by the voyage, now seldom went on deck. Miss Clarkson and I, however, found it decidedly restful and refreshing to spend an hour in the middle of the day above. This hour we devoted to a vigorous walk up and down the deck, and we learned to greatly prize our "daily constitutional."

When the sea was rough Doctor Andral, Jack Burton, or sometimes Col. Bird gave us an arm in the promenade. The latter was neither agreeable to Maria nor myself; and yet, rather than precipitate a scene we endured him.

It was clear that Col. Bird was by no means pleased that the Doctor should offer to accompany us; and I once heard him complaining at the interference of a ship's officer in the recreations of the passengers.

One unusually fine day Maria and I, having taken our promenade, seated ourselves on the sunny side of the vessel, awaiting the dinner hour.

Presently we heard the welcome bell and instantly Jack, the Doctor and Bird came to us. The two latter simultaneously asked the privilege of assisting me below. Acting on my preference, I took Dr. Andral's arm; and as we turned to go below I heard the Colonel angrily saying to a fellow passenger: "If she prefers the company of a coward she is welcome to it so far as I am concerned."

My cheeks tingled at the insulting and base aspersion; but the Doctor, who must have heard every word, seemed totally oblivious to it.

Still we were working south, and the desolate volcanic crags of which we occasionally caught a glimpse on our starboard, and the faintly illumined heavens, as we saw or fancied, reminded us that we, at the world's end, were passing the Islands of Terra del Fuego.

At this time the cold and stormy weather kept us almost constantly below. One day, a slight improvement over its fellows, my father insisted on going on deck. I tried to dissuade him, saying he had remained in the cabin so steadily that exposure to the chilling air above would be bad for him. "But," said he, "my child, I must have fresh air or I'll suffocate." And despite my entreaties he put on his overcoat and went above. It was not long before he had enough of it and started for the companion-way.

The vessel was pitching and tossing; the flying spray was freezing where it fell, and the stairway was slippery, and somehow my father fell, and I was only made sure of it by seeing him borne into the cabin by two sailors. Upon examination the surgeon reported his leg broken.

Here was a pitiable condition. Added to my father's feeble health and broken limb was the fact of a plunging and tossing ship in a wintry and stormy sea.

The kindly aid and comfort so freely given by Andrew and Rebecca Gray, and by many others whose memories I shall ever cherish, went to my heart. Nor could I be otherwise than grateful to the Doctor for his kind and sympathetic services.

Of the passage of the gloomy Cape I know but little, being too much engaged in ministration to my dear father to take note.

I only know that day succeeded day of wintry darkness, of thundering seas and reeling ship, of somber clouds and dreary fogs ,and of supreme discomfort.

Once, when the surgeon insisted that I must go on deck for a breath of air and I went up with him, there burst on my view a scene of incomparable wildness. The low-hanging clouds shot by with arrowy swiftness, and the green, careering seas seemed racing with the clouds, while their foaming crests were lifted like hostile banners toward the threatening sky. Here and there were icebergs, seemingly immovably fixed, while round them raged and roared a sea that burst in thunder and foam, and tossed its spray to their topmost pinnacles.

This much I had scarcely time to observe when the wind that had abated came down upon us and instantly the sea was swept into a seething spray that filled the air and smote the face with a stinging force and drove me in a precipitate retreat below.

Thus in confusion and storm passed day after day, depressing to the strong and well; and oh, how dismal and exhausting to the sick!

My poor father, tossed in his bunk by th ship's motion, could not rest by day night. Added to the broken and inflamed limb a fever set in.

One afternoon Mrs. Gray insisted that as the weather was favorable I must go above for air and exercise. The winds and waves had fallen, and when I came on deck I saw a vision that will never depart from memory. The sun was setting, and his parting rays bathed the outlying icebergs until—

"Each purple peak, each flinty spire Seemed bathed in floods of living fire:"

while between me and the setting sun there was enkindled a glory whose radiance was as the pathway of the Omnipotent.

Then I went down to the dull, cavernous depths below; but I had been on the mount of transfiguration with my Lord.

Alas, this was the calm before the storm! For soon the clouds I had seen on the horizon's rim swept over the sky, and the winds went shrieking through the cordage, and the ship was staggering under ponderous blows, and great seas leaped upon her deck and rushed through the scuppers.

But of this I know little. I only know that there was a great confusion of noises and motions. The cry of the hurricane, the roar of the waves, the fall of heavy weights overhead, mingled with the sharp shouts of command and the tramp of heavy feet made an ineffaceable impression on my memory.

Added to these was the disheartening thought that my father was slipping from my grasp. My burdened heart could not bear it. How I longed for the counsel and comfort of my departed mother; and my soul cried out:

"O, for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still."

My only remaining protector was dying; and I, orphaned and friendless, far from country, home and kindred, should be left at the very end of the earth, and that on a terrible and stormy sea. True, in my calmer moments I knew I had overdrawn the picture. Dear friends and kind hands were ever about me, ready to aid with a promptness that appealed to every emotion of grutitude; but these were comparative strangers, the chance acquaintances of a voyage, and this over, if it ended not in the deep sea's depths they would leave me and go on their several ways, and I?—the thought was appalling.

Persistency Wins.

Persistency is characteristic of all men who have accomplished anthing great. They may lack in some other particular, may have many weaknesses and eccentricities, but the quality of persistence is never absent in a successful man. No matter what opposition he meets, or what discouragements overtake him, he is always persistent. Drudgery cannot disgust him, labor cannot weary him. He will persist, no matter what comes or what goes; it is part of his nature; he could almost as easily stop breathing. It is not so much brilliancy of intellect or fertility of resources as persistency of effort, constancy of purpose, that gives success. Persistency always inspires confidence. Everybody believes in the man who persists. He may meet misfortunes, sorrows and reverses, but everybody believes that he will ultimately triumph, because they know there is no keeping him down. "Does he keep at it—is he persistent?" This is the question which the world asks about a man. Even a man with small ability will often succeed if he has the quality of persistence, where a genius without it would fail.—Journal of Agriculture.

No Time to Be a Christian.

I say to my friend, "Be a Christian." That means to be a full man. And he says to me, "I have not time to be a Christian. I have not room. If my life was not so full! You don't know how hard I work from morning till night. What time is there for me to be a Christian? What time is there, what room is there, for Christianity in such a life as mine?" But does it not come to seem to us so strange, so absurd, if it was not so melancholy, that man should say such a thing as that?

It is as if the engine had said it had no room for the steam, It is as if the tree had said it had no room for the sap. It is as if the ocean had said that it had no room for the tide. It is as if the man said that he had no room for his soul. It is as if life said that it had no time to live, when it is life. It is not something that is added to life; it is life. * * * Life is the thing we seek, and man finds it in the fulfillment of his life by Jesus Christ.—Phillips Brooks.

The Mutineer in the Church.

"The mutineer is an able-bodied miscreant, who will strike a hard blow whenever he can get an opportunity, and at any person whom he can reach," writes Ian Maclaren, of "The Mutineer in the Church," in the November Ladies' Home Journal. "His sole desire is to do mischief, and the more pain he gives the better is he pleased. He will write insulting letters to the minister, charging him with every sin from heresy to lying. He will get up a public controversy about the affairs of the congregation in any newspaper which is foolish enough to insert his letters. He will attack the most reasonable proposals of the office-bearers, and impute to them the worst motives. He will move through the congregation as an incendiary, and set fire to every inflammable person. When he is in his glory he will threaten proceedings in the church courts, or in the civil courts; and although he will never carry them out, being a coward as well as a bully, he will take the preliminary steps, which cause talk and alarm. It will also be part of his role to pose as a straightforward and honest man of unflinching rectitude and spiritual aims. What he does will always be under constraint of conscience, and he will summon himself and his opponents with much rhetorical effect before the bar of eternal justice. He is so big and blatant, and good people are so charitable and easily cowed, that they often take this man at his own value and come to terms with him."

Finding Fault With Providence.

The sign is bad when folks commence
A findin' fault with Providence,
And balkin' 'cause the earth don't shake
At every prancin' step they take.
No man is great till he can see
How less than little he can be Ef stripped to self, and stark and bare
He hung his sign out anywhere.
My doctern is to lay aside
Contentions, and be satisfied.
Jest do your best, and praise er blame
That follows, that counts jest the same.
I've allus noticed great success
Is mixed with troubles more or less,
And it's the man that does the best
That gets more kicks than all the rest.

Edison's First Check.

When Tom Edison completed his model of the now famous "ticker" he submitted it to the president of a telegraph company, who asked him to leave it for examination. Edison was out of money, and his landlady had warned him for the last time. He had decided to ask $5,000 for his invention, says the New York Press, but when the president at the next interview asked his price his courage oozed away, and he faltered out that he would like the company to make an offer.

"How would $40,000 suit you?" said the president.

"What!" exclaimed the young wizard, "all in money?"

"Certainly; you can have it now."

"All right."

A check was drawn and handed over to Edison with these words: "That is a check for $40,000. Go to the bank around the corner and they will give you the money."

At the bank he got into the long line and worked up to the paying teller's window. Then he pushed the check over the sill. The teller saw that it was not endorsed, and pushed it back with fitting remarks, which Edison did not understand, he being even then slightly deaf. He retired crestfallen, and the thought dawned upon him that he had been swindled. He had another scene with his landlady that night and visited the telegraph president the next morning in sheer desperation. He told of his experience at the bank and begged for his money or his model. He was properly identified at the bank, endorsed the check and got his money in big bills.—The Patent Record.

Be Something.

Be something in this living age,
And prove your right to be
A light upon some darkened page,
A pilot on some sea.
Find out the place where you may stand,
Beneath some burden low;
Take up the task with willing hand,
Be something, somewhere, now!

Be something in this throbbing day
Of busy hands and feet,
A spring beside some dusty way,
A shadow from the heat.
Be found upon the workman's roll;
Go sow, go reap, or plow;
Bend to some task with heart and soul—
Be something, somewhere, now!

Rich Relatives.

I always feel encouraged when I remember what rich relatives I have. God is my Father, he calls me his child, and gives me the undoubted assurance that he has adopted me into his family. Jesus Christ is my Elder Brother. He is the best brother any one can possibly have. The Holy Ghost declares himself to be my Comforter; that is, my Helper. If God be my Father, Jesus Christ my Elder Brother and the Holy Ghost my Helper, then I am surely blest with rich relations. These relations have pledged themselves to help me to their utmost in every time of need. If they be for me who can harm me?—The Rev. John Thompson, in the True Republic.

Rules for the Conduct of Employees.

The Chicago Journal seeks to correct an evil which is too common with some employees, especially new ones, by resolving their conduct into the following formulated rules. The reader, of course, need not be told that this is sarcasm, which is not infrequently the better way of pricking the conscience of that class of often unconsciously erring persons:

Always treat the persons who call to see your employer with contempt, so that they may appreciate your importance.

If a lady should happen to call at the office, act real haughty. Perhaps she will mistake you for a junior member of the firm.

Always remember your employer is a flathead and don't know his business. Why should he pretend to know anything?

If you should have an office boy under you, be sure to bulldoze him. As you were once bulldozed yourself, you have a perfect right to make it hot for Percival.

Act ugly around the office. Let the boss see you knock over a few chairs, pretending in the meantime you are hustling. He's a lobster, anyway, and will never get onto your curves.

Never forget that your employer owes his success to bullheaded luck. At your age he couldn't compare with what you are.

If you are trusted with the handling of any of your employer's money, be sure to brag to him how much you lost on the prizefight. He will admire your sporting blood.

If the boss won't give you a raise, do everything as sloppy as you can until he does.

Tell every one in the office what you think of the old man. They will admire your acumen.

Don't worry a rap if the firm you are working for is losing money. It isn't any of your funeral.

If any one attempts to call you down for your impudence, start to fight them on the spot. Nobody has a right to say anything to you.

When customers are talking over the telephone, holler at them. Let them know you have no time to monkey with them.

Always remember that callers are anxious to hear you express your views on politics and religion. If the person you are talking to looks pious use as much profanity as you can.

KIDNEY TROUBLE PREYS UPON THE MIND.

Women as Well as Men Suffer and Are Made Miserable by Kidney and Bladder Trouble.

Kidney trouble preys upon the mind, discourages and lessens ambition; beauty, vigor and cheerfulness gradually disappear, when the kidneys are out of order.

Kidney trouble has become so prevalent that it is not uncommon for a child to be born afflicted with weak kidneys.

Pains, aches and rheumatism come from excess of uric acid in the blood due to neglected kidney trouble.

Kidney trouble often causes quick or unsteady heart-beats and makes one feel as though they had heart trouble, because the heart is overworked, in pumping thick, kidney-poisoned blood through the veins and arteries.

Unhealthy urine from unhealthy kidneys is the chief cause of bladder trouble, followed by suffering so painful to many that life is made miserable.

The bladder is situated in front of and very close to the womb, and for that reason any pain, distress, disease or inconvenience manifested in the kidneys, back, bladder or urinary passage is often, by mistake, attributed to female weakness or womb trouble of some sort. The error is easily made and may be easily avoided by paying a little attention to the condition of the urine.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your urine and let it stand twenty-four hours; a sediment or settling indicates an unhealthy condition of the kidneys; if it stains the linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it or pain in the back, dull, heavy headache, nervousness, irritability, plenty of ambition but no strength, weak circulation, sallow complexion; these are all convincing proofs that the kidneys and bladder need prompt attention.

The symptoms you have noticed are the danger signals nature sets to show that the track of health is not clear.

Take the advice of one who has made a life study of just such conditions and look well to yourself, because you have kidney trouble.

Bright's Disease, which is destroying more human lives than any other disease, may be stealing upon you.

There is comfort in knowing that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy, fulfills every wish in promptly curing kidney, bladder and uric acid troubles.

THOUSANDS OF WOMEN HAVE KIDNEY TROUBLE BEFORE THEY SUSPECT IT.

Swamp-Root is the wonderful new discovery of the eminent kidney specialist, Dr. Kilmer, and is used in the leading hospitals; recommended by skillful physicians in their private practice; and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that medical science has ever been able to compound.

To prove what Swamp-Root will do for you, send at once to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., who will gladly send you, free by mail, immediately, without cost to you, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book of wonderful Swamp Root testimonials. Be sure to say that you read this article in the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Swamp-Root is for sale the world over at druggists' in bottles of two sizes and two prices—fifty cents and one dollar. Remember the name, Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y.

Washing Dishes.

To wash dishes in half the time, and do it well, follow this recipe: Always use hot water—not warm, but hot. It is best to use mops with china and glass, and to have a nice lather; instead of using soap, use Gold Dust Washing Power; dissolve a teaspoonful in the hot water and wash quickly; have plenty of nice dry towels to wipe with; have a drainer that will allow the water to run off the dishes into the receptacle below, when you will have highly polished glass and china.

Influence of Smiles.

Of all the appearances of the human countenance, methinks a smile is the most extraordinary. It plays with a surprising agreeableness in the eye, breaks out with the brightest distinction and sits like a glory upon the countenance.

What sun is there within us that shoots his rays with so sudden a vigor? To see the soul flash in the face at this rate, one would think would convert an atheist. By the way, we may observe that smiles are much more becoming than frowns. This seems a natural encouragement to good humor; as much as to say, If people have a mind to be handsome they must not be peevish and untoward.—Jeremy Collier.

With The Children.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS, PLATTSBURG, MO.

The Red Box Clew—X.

Frank drew a hassock to Mrs. Dew's feet and seated herself, looking up at her friend. "You don't know how different I feel since you began to talk to me," she said. "It's strange! After all, I believe Ronald was right about 'Heart's Aflame.' It was mighty nice reading it, but after it was done I have felt so queer—not like myself. And yet, I could have gone on reading novels just like it. And it looked like I wanted to be unhappy."

"And now you feel willing to be happy?"

Frank laughed. "I have no objections. But I had before. I will try to tell you how everything got different. It was when you called me a child of God. That very minute I knew I knew I oughtn't to be spending my time over such books. Mrs. Dew, are you a child of God?"

"Yes, my dear."

"And was that why you spoke to me, because I was doing wrong, and you and I are sisters, with the same Father? Nobody ever talked to me that way but Bro. Wilton. Because Mr. West was not a Christian, and Miss West died before I was old. Isn't it sweet to think that every one that loves God is a brother or sister to each other, and that we are one big family with the same Father?"

"It is a sweet thought," said Mrs. Dew with a sigh.

"And the world is full of Christians," said Frank; "so how can you get lonesome? Just think! My brothers and sisters are everywhere! I oughtn't to feel alone in the world, ought I?"

"But, my dear," said the housekeeper, "a great many Christians are not friendly with each other."

"Not friendly!" echoed Frank in surprise. "Why, Mrs. Dew! And they love God?"

"Of course; they are Christians."

"But I don't see how you can love God and not feel friendly to your sister. The very Bible says so. I know it is in John's Epistle. It says that the way you can know you have passed from death to life is by knowing that you love your brethren. So if you don't love other Christians you haven't passed from death."

"But sometimes your brother does you a great wrong," said Mrs. Dew, who looked pale and troubled; "a terrible wrong. He takes from you something you love with all your heart; a child, perhaps. Then, can you love him?"

"I don't understand that," said Frank. "But I don't see how he could be more than your enemy."

"Frank," said the other in a sharp voice, "you are only a child; you don't know the world."

"Mrs. Dew," said the girl earnestly, as she caught Mrs. Dew's hand, "I am only a child, and I don't know the world. But Jesus was the Son of God, and he knew everything. And he said over and over that his follower could not hate his brother, or his neighbor, and must forgive ever so many times—seventy times seven; and after that must keep on forgiving as he would hope to be forgiven."

Mrs. Dew was silent.

"Oh, Mrs. Dew," cried the child, in a voice of read distress, "do you hate somebody? Has somebody done you a wrong that you can't forgive? Was it very wicked? You mustn't be angry with me for talking to you so, for I am your little sister, and I love you. But although he may have done a crime against you, so wicked, don't you know God will love him better than you if he repents and you keep on hating him? You can't hate anybody! Because God is love; and how can he come into your heart if hate is there? Love can't come where there is hate already."

"Oh, Frank, Frank! you do not know—you cennot!"

"Yes, I do, for the Bible says so. It tells me, and you know it speaks of the wisdom of children who love God. 'He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God,' it says."

"Little one," said Mrs. Dew, "pray with me." Frank was a little frightened at the strange tones, but she knelt down, and the housekeeper knelt with her arm about Frank. Then Mrs. Dew said, just above a whisper, "Oh, God, how often I have prayed that thou wouldst deal out justice to the man who took from me my little one! But now I offer up a new prayer: that thou wilt take this bitter hatred from my heart, and that thou wilt forgive both me and my enemy." Then Mrs. Dew arose and said, "Frank, leave me, my dear."

Frank went out of the room greatly mystified. What did Mrs. Dew mean by saying a man had taken from her her littie one? Could it be that somebody had killed her child? Or perhaps her child had been abducted and all trace lost of her! Suddenly the thought flashed through her mind, "May I not be Mrs. Dew's daughter?" To be sure, she had little reason to believe it. But her parents were unknown, and, as she understood the case, Mrs. Dew had lost her own child. She must find out the age of the child when it was lost. Frank was greatly excited at the thought, but her excitement was not all of pleasure. Mrs. Dew was not such a mother as she had dreamed of. To be sure, she was good and kind; but she did not dress in fine clothes, she was not beautiful and she did not live in a palace; at least, not in a palace of her own. Should her mother turn out to be a great lady it would seem the most natural thing in the world. But a housekeeper! It was no use to tell herself that this feeling was unworthy a Christian. The feeling was there. She went out in the pasture to think over what she had heard, and to wonder if her fancy could be true. Crossing the footbridge, she entered the thick grove, where the air was soft and still and smelled of trees and moss. She had not gone far into the grove before her eye was attracted by a fluttering dress. Then a woman was seen advancing toward her. As she came well in sight, Frank began to fear.

The woman was the very same of whom she used to dream. There could be no doubt of it. And, yes, she was the woman Frank had sometimes imagined followed her at a distance in St. Louis. She was very ragged, very dark, very unclean. She wore a dingy-red handkerchief bound about her rough hair, but this did not keep her locks from straying out and curling up at the edges like little snakes trying to turn over. Her eyes were small and black. The bone had been eaten out of her nose by some unpleasant disease, so her nose hung on her face and moved about in the strangest and most unconventional manner. As if this were not bad enough, its owner had the habit of twitching it to one side, as if she wanted to make sure that it was still there. Her sleeves just reached to her elbows, turning out those knobby members and the thin, soiled arms to the public view. Frank did not know whether to run away or treat this person as she would have treated any other stranger. She could not rid herself of the thought that here was some one who could tell her about her parents. A horror came upon her at the thought that this woman might be her mother. The thought was so frightful that it deprived the child of the power of running away, even had she desired to make the attempt; so she stood still, as if looking upon a ghost.

"Good day to you, pudding," said the woman in a sharp, shrill voice, as a grin worked itself over her face and got caught on the thin lips and stayed there. "You don't know me, my pudding?"

"I do not, certainly," said Frank, with dignity. The woman twitched her nose at Frank, as much as to say, "What do you think of that? You can't do it!" But she said aloud, "You never see me, my hasty pudding?"

"I am not sure. Do you want to go to the house? Do—did you want anything?"

"I s'pose you want to git shet of me," said the woman. It was strange how her smiles began at the corner of one eye, wrinkled up her cheek and worked itself to her mouth. She gave one of these exhibitions before proceeding. "No, my plum pudding, I ain't come to git nothing; I've come to give something. I ain't come to go to the house, but to make you come to me. I can work you like you was a jumpingjack on wires, with me at the eend of the wires. I just stood out here and says out loud, 'Apple pudding, apple pudding, you come over here to Nance!' and purty soon I see you acoming along as if you didn't know what you was acoming to. Now, don't you look scart, pudding, I ain't agoing to hurt you. I'm agoing to give you a charm. See!" The old woman thrust her hand into the bosom of her grimy dress and brought forth a small, round, red box. "Now you take this, plum pudding, and don't you let nobody see it till you've saw inside of it. So fare ye well, pudding, and this ain't the last time you'll see me, neither!" Saying which the old woman twitched her nose, worked off another grin and vanished among the trees, leaving the curious box in Frank's hand.

The Advance Society.

This is our last talk together before Christmas, as I intend next week to have another chapter from the Red Box Clew. So I take this opportunity of sending you all my very best wishes, and would send something else, only it would be too expensive. I hope you will get a lot of candy and skates and sleds and dolls and books and things, and that you will have Sunday-school entertainments and all be in "pieces," and get to make speeches, and make your kinfolks proud of you. And I hope you will resolve, harder than ever, to read only the best kind of books and to stick to poetry and history; in short, to the Advance Society. Here is a letter from Mary A. Rice: "I have never written to you before, as my brother wrote when we joined. I have been reading Torchbearers of History; only one week I read a history of India through. I have read about 1,800 lines of poetry. I never read much of either before I joined the society; don't care so much for history, but I like poetry first-rate. My quotation: 'Only those are crowned and sainted, who with griefs have been acquainted.' My favorite book is Little Women; I have read it through nine or ten times. My next is Honor Bright; then, Little Men (read through six times). Other favorites: We and the World, Five Little Peppers, John Halifax, etc. I am very much interested in the Red Box Clew. It always stops at an interesting place and nearly sets a person wild waiting for the next paper." Here is from Maudie Seelinger, Butler, Mo.: "I have decided to join the Advance Society. I am 12. Once a little boy went to school as his sister went; the teacher asked him his age and he said, 'I am four, but I was six, once.'" From Twin Bridges, Mont., Agnes Mountjoy writes: "I would like to join the Advance Society, and I hope to be on the Honor List. I enjoy reading about the society, and I also enjoy the stories very much. My brother and sister, John (11) and Lucile (9), would like to join. I am 13."

Lola Cox: "I will tell about my favorites in fiction: Aunt Martha, Phronsie Pepper, Wm. Harris. Those of history: Sir Humphrey Gilbert, Walter Raleigh, Columbus, Capt. John Smith, Geo. Washington." Julia Cox writes: "My favorites of fiction are, Simon Tapley, Estella Whimple, Robinson Crusoe, Charley Wright, etc. Of history, Geo. Washington, Wm. Penn, Paul Revere, Raleigh, Gen. A. S. Johnston." From Muteetse, Wyoming, Dottie Standish writes: "I kept the five resolutions nine weeks, then forgot to read a verse in the Bible; so I had to begin anew. I kept them 16 weeks before I missed again. In eight more weeks I want to be on the Honor List again, for I haven't missed a day for four weeks. I will send you my picture." (I received the picture with pleasure and put it with the other pictures that have been sent me by our members. I am proud of the collection. Dottie's picture is that of a girl you would expect to begin right over again if she failed at first.) She sends this good quotation: "Diving and finding no pearl in the sea, Blame not the ocean, the fault is in thee." Bertha Beesley says: "Instead of reading a verse in the Bible every day, I have read two chapters, sometimes more; but that is too much, now that I am going to school. I think the Advance Society is a grand thing." Vera Davenport writes from Perry, O. T.: "I did not keep up the Advance Society long, but I think I shall resume it. I think I know how the Red Box Clew will turn out; I think Frank Douglas is the daughter of Mrs. Dew."

This is from Gerald Dever: "I was ten years Oct. 27th. I am delighted with Aunt Maria's Saturday Talks. Mamma read Little Kings to me, and my teacher, Bessie Rogers, read Little Presidents and Little Queens to the pupils. We lend to all who will read; sometimes we have 20 books lent out at one time. [My! what do you do when they don't bring 'em back?] It makes us glad to see how others enjoy reading them. [Well there is something in that.] In our entertainment we had a flag drill. We marched and waved flags and sang the chorus, 'Hurrah, hurrah for Uncle Sam, He's always in the swim. There are no other nations that can get the best of HIM!'" Mrs. M. D. Dever also commends Saturday Talks, and says: "They are fine, and each family in the Advance Society should own a set." She and Gerald are reading Grafton's Life of A. Campbell. She says: "We intend to continue the Advance work," which I am very glad to hear.

Lily Gooch and Clara Moses, who live together, write this letter in partnership: "We are going to always try to keep the Advance resolutions. We like the story of the Red Box Clew. We have talked it over, and this is our guess: We believe that Mrs. Dew is Frank Douglas' mother, and that Mrs. Dew was a rich lady and somebody who was an enemy to her and her husband stole their little babe and left her (Frank) on the porch where Mr. and Miss West found her. The Dews spent their fortunes trying to find their lost little daughter, when Mr. Dew died with a broken heart; but the mother lived on in the hopes of some day finding her little daughter. Her fortune being gone she had to apply as housekeeper for Mrs. Clarmont, in order to make her living; thus the little girl and her mother were thrown together. The mother's heart recognized Frank as her child." (I won't say whether this is a true solution or not, as that would spoil the story, but I'll say it is a good guess; and if things don't turn out that way they might have done so.) Mabel Gunther writes from Waterloo, Ia.: "Our president moved away and our society didn't have meetings for a few weeks, and then school began. But now we have started anew with clear records and intend to keep them clear. Lurah Walrath is president, Essa Austin is vice-president and treasurer. I am secretary. To-day we met with an attendance of five. We opened by song and prayer, followed by history about Benj. Franklin. Willoughby Gunther spoke a piece, after which the Bible verses were read. I read the Red Box Clew in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, which we all enjoyed. I also handed the quotations to each one. We recited the quotation of last week. We closed by singing and the Endeavor Benediction. I will try faithfully to get my name on the Honor List. I wish some of our faithful workers would write to me." Here is from Walter Rex, Philadelphia: "I do not live in this beautiful city, but I am to be here all winter and go to school, and mamma will send me the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I am staying at my uncle's where there are three girls (11, 12 and 15) and one boy, John Mathews (13). We have started an Advance Society, and two of our friends are in it with us. This is what we do when we meet: We call the roll and each answers if he kept the resolutions for two weeks (we meet every two weeks, on Saturday). Then the one who has been appointed for that time to give out quotations tells us what two to get before the next meeting, and we have to get the same quotations. A different person is selected each time for this giving out. Then we have a reading from history, and a poem read or recited, and discussion about what books or papers we are reading and that kind of thing. But the very first thing, the two last Children's Pages in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST are read aloud, and everybody has to promise not to read the story until the meeting. So as soon as the paper comes we hide it away. One person reads one page and another the second, and it's fun. I don't see why the story is called the Red Box Clew, since there's no red box in it. It might as well have been a White Box Clew, or a White Elephant, as far as I can see. I am 12." (This letter was written before the red box made its appearance in the story.)

New Honor List: Lily Gooch and Clara Moses (fourth quarter), Ashland, Ill.; Mrs. M. D. Dever and Gerald Dever (fourth quarter), Hume, Ill.; Bertha Beesley (second quarter), Moselle, Mo.; Dottie Standish (first), Muteetse, Wyo.; D. M. Shafer (fourth), Decatur, Texas; Julia Cox (fourth) and Lola Cox (third), Cox, Mo.; Blanche Harshfield (second), Doniphan, Neb.; Mattie Lorena Upton, Houstonia, Mo.; Mary A. Rice, Ainsworth, Ia. This is certainly a good Christmas Honor List, and I congratulate you. I would like to have some more stories about winter, and how you get the most fun out of what some people (generally old people, I am sorry to say,) consider the dreariest part of the year.

CLOSING WORDS.

The passage which constitutes the theme of our present study is the last utterance of the Old Testament. This applies, of course, to its position in the canon of the Old Testament Scriptures, rather than to the time of its utterance as it has already been seen in previous studies that there are writings in the Old Testament which come from a date later than the Book of Malachi. But there is a peculiar fitness in placing this book last just as there is in putting the Apocalypse of the New Testament in the last position among the books of the Bible, for though the Revelation of John was comparatively early in its date as related to the other writings of the New Testament and of John, still it has a logical fitness at the close of the other books, dealing as it with the struggle between evil and good and emphasizing as it does the final triumph of righteousness. So the Book of Malachi in the Old Testament gathers up the great principles of the prophetic teaching and emphasizes them with words of warning, which ought to have gone home to the hearts of the Jewish people. In this respect the two closing books of the Old and New Testaments stand in striking contrast. Malachi is a book of warning, of reproof and corrections. It point out the danger of sin and its inevitable consequences in national and individual retribution. It threatens the coming of the messenger of the covenant, the Elijah who is to set things right with a strong hand, and calls the attention of the nation to the ancestral law set forth by Moses. The Apocalypse of the New Testament, on the contrary, is a book of encouragement. It makes its appearance in the time of distress when the Apostolic Church was in the throes of a great persecution, and its constant note is that of hope and encouragement, while it closes with the majestic vision of the new heaven and the new earth in which dwells righteousness, and which were to succeed the present distress. In this respect we have the characteristic difference between the Old and the New. The first was a covenant of warning and rebuke. The second is a covenant of encouragement and hope. The first warned men away from the abyss of sin. The last encourages them to gain the heights of companionship with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.

The prophet in the words of this lesson still continues his controversy with those members of the community who seem to be the great majority and whose complaint was that the services of the sanctuary were useless. It has been seen in the former study that the priests and people combined to offer worthless sacrifices at the temple with the feeling that what was useless for any other purpose could be very well employed for this. The prophet uttered words of sternest rebuke concerning this practice and warned them that they were defying and insulting God by offering such gifts as they would not have dared to take to their Persian governor. In this lesson he pursues the same argument and considers the objection which they have made, that the service of God is unprofitable, and that the wicked men in the community, those who are boldly and outrageously defiant of the divine will, who oppress the poor and strip the needy, are happy and prosperous. This was always the difficult problem in Israel's career. The simple philosophy of the early days so frequently set forth in the Book of Proverbs, viz., that the good are always blessed and the evil always suffer, had broken down under the pressure of experience. It was one of the problems for prophets and wise men to solve as to why the righteous suffered and sinners were permitted to succeed. But along with the consideration of this problem grew up that tentative answer to it which finds embodiment in the Book of Job and even partial expression in Habbakuk and other prophets, that one must not judge by outward appearances, for God has his purposes, and perhaps the trial and the discipline of the righteous is one of these; that it is rather by holding on in confidence in the divine purpose and in the ultimate triumph of good that one is to fortify his soul and bear his part in the divine plan.

That there were those who took this view of the situation is borne out by the references which appear both in Malachi and the Psalms to the party of "those who feared the Lord," or the "righteous" or "humble" or "meek," as they are variously designated. And we read in this lesson that they were accustomed to meet together, that they spake one with another. In these little meetings, where probably the prophet himself was numbered in the circle, they fortified each other by mutual encouragement and waited for the better day which they felt certain would come. There is nothing more inspiring in the study of the Old Testament than this frequent note of confidence in God and of resolution to abide faithful in the midst of troubles whose meaning could not be understood and whose issue could not be foreseen. How often in the Psalms as well as in the prophetic writings one finds that spirit displayed, and when he considers the fact that the Jew of these older times had so little upon which to anchor his soul as compared with the majestic splendor of the gospel, which is the surety and fortress of our hopes in these days; when he thinks of the changing character of prophecy, of the mutations in Israel's history, by which its leaders rise and fall without a seeming continuity of adequate direction, as contrasted with the personal presence of our Lord, not only in the historical experiences of the church, but in our present daily life—he comes to regard with deepening reverence that faith which clung to God in spite of all obstacles and confidently waited for the coming light that told the day was dawning. No wonder the prophet, speaking for God, said of these men, these faithful and righteous men, who still believed and trusted in the midst of darkness, that they were his and should be his peculiar treasure in that coming day which he was preparing.

This Day occupies also a part of the prophet's thought. It was that day of which many prophets had spoken, from Zephaniah on, the great day of the Lord, the day of crisis, the day of wrath and of reward, the time when evil should be revealed and righteousness vindicated, the day whose burning light should be the destruction of evil, but the inspiration and power of righteousness. This was the day of judgment; not simply some far-off time of divine division between good and bad, but that period, close at hand, whenever the prophet felt the approach of a time of crisis. This note constantly recurs in the prophecy of the Old Testament, as well as in the preaching of the New. The day of judgment has come to mean with us some far-off day in which all things will be gathered for the final account; but the biblical meaning of the day of judgment is that continuous and recurring process of divine discrimination between the good and evil which is constantly repeating itsely, even though imperceptibly, before our eyes. Individuals and nations come to judgment and we take an instant's note of of the fact, but do not realize its supreme significance. Every day is a day of judgment, the precursor and sign of the final day when all hearts shall be disclosed.

The study closes with an exhortation to remember the law of Moses, the man of God who stands as the common denominator of all Israel's institutes, from the majestic day of Sinai on to the conclusion of the history All the law which the nation ever possessed was, in the truest and highest sense, the law of Moses, because, however the primitive constitution of the nation was amplified in subsequent times, it was always in the spirit of the great legislator, whose shadow was thus cast over the entire national experience. And with Moses, the giver of the law, is connected intimately Elijah, the restorer of the law, who had come like a thunderbolt in the time of the proud king Ahab to rebuke the idolatries of the nation. Such a prophet was needed again, and such a prophet is always needed in times when the church becomes forgetful of her heritage and her duty and turns to other enterprises than those at which her Master set her. The duty of such an Elijah, who may have come in the person of Nehemiah, who probably appeared soon after these words were spoken, and who always reappears in the person of any strong and earnest reformer in the church, as he appeared once in the person of John the Baptist, as Jesus said, is to prepare the way for the coming of the Lord, to announce the approach of the kingdom and to prepare all classes for its reception. Specifically, as the prophet states it, his duty was to convince the fathers, that is, the old men who held to the traditions and teaching of the past, that they need the co-operation and help of the children, the young men whose vision was that of the future with all of its powers of progress and of hope; while at the same time he was to bring to the younger men, who might forget the teaching, of the past, a new consideration for the wisdom of the fathers, without whose help the lesson of the past could never be learned. As Joel said and Peter repeated on the day of Pentecost, the young men must see the vision, and the old men must dream the dream—the vision looking to the growth and progress of the future, the dream recalling the strength and fidelity of the past; and thus old men and young together, fathers and children, with united effort, are to prepare for the new triumphs of that kingdom for whose coming in its fullness and power we ever pray.

Nerves and Heart

Are what do the work of life for the human body.

Except by your sensations you know little of them, but they are untiring as servants, sentinels and supporters.

If they are strained you falter; if they are hurt you suffer, if they get weak you fail. Are you aware that

DR. J. H. McLEAN'S STRENGTHENING CORDIAL AND BLOOD PURIFIER

Is the most precious agency known for stimulating the Heart and Nervous System?

This is true; over fifty years of use have established it beyond question.

It repairs the tissue-waste of hard physical labor; it sustains the overworked brain and develops the faculty of thought.

It cures Malaria, Debility, Dyspepsia, Low Spirits, Insomnia, Poor Appetite, Malnutrition and Stomach Troubles and builds up the run down or exhausted system. Try it.

All druggists keep it. 50c. and $1 a bottle.

Indianapolis, Ind. Mrs A. M. Gardner, 195 E. Morris St., of our city, has a word to say to her ailing sisters: "I have been a sufferer for years from heart and liver trouble. I tried all kinds of remedies, but failed to find relief. Noted doctors failed to cure me and I had just about given up all hope of ever getting well again, when I began the use of Dr. Peter's Blood Vitalizer. I can now do my work again, feel well and strong, and must say that the Blood Vitalizer has done me worlds of good."

FACTS ABOUT CHINA. A statement and Appeal. By William Remfry Hunt. Christian Pub. Co., St. Louis. 1899. Price, 25 cents.

One of the timeliest little books we have read for some time is this handsome little volume, recently from the presses of the Christian Pub. Co. It is what its name states, "Facts About China," and they are boiled down facts. It is about the best specimen of multum in parvo we have ever seen. Just now when the "open-door" policy in China is such a live subject, and when our expanding commerce with that country in connection with our new Asiatic possessions is attracting wide attention, the book is most timely from a commercial point of view. But those who are interested in the redemption of China by the gospel will find a deep interest in this little volume. To show the author's art in condensation take this paragraph on the "Strange Manners and Customs in China:"

There is no courtship in China. The bridegroom in many cases does not see the face until after the ceremony is over. Old men fly kites, boys and girls work in the fields. The education of the higher class of girls is neglected. Their feet are bound. There are no regular candy stores. Butchers kill the ox and hang it up whole; you may cut it where you like. The price and quality are uniform. Women wear trousers and short skirts, while the men wear long robes. Both smoke. Tea saloons abound. There are no gin palaces.

The statement of China's needs and his appeal for help are both strong. An interesting feature of the book is its list of our own missionaries in China and their fields of labor. Its compactness and cheapness should give it a wide circulation among the people. It is appropriately dedicated to Archibald McLean, corresponding secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

DECEMBER MAGAZINES.

A glance at the the table of contents of the Chautauquan for December at once declares it to be one of its foremost issues in its grasp upon interesting and timely topics. It is also a beautifully illustrated number from cover to finish. Among the leading topics discussed are Trusts, Parliamentary Reform in the House of Representatives, Economics and Socialism, the Inner Life of Phillips Brooks, and many others.

"The Youthful Struggles of Napoleon Bonaparte" are to be described in the next volume of the Youth's Companion. Enthralling as a story, the article is the result of the recent minute historical researches of the Professor of History at Columbia University, Prof. W. M. Sloane. A similar article on "The Boyhood of Admiral Farragut" will be contributed by Capt. A. T. Mahan, describing some exciting incidents in Farragut's boyhood, when, although only a midshipman of eleven, he participated in one of the most sanguinary battles of the war of 1812.

The Decemcer Coming Age is a capital number. The issue closes the first year of this magazine. Among the leading subjects treated are, "Puritanism and Play Houses of Boston, by the Rev. J. Henry Wiggin; "American Art," by J. J. Enneking; "The Life and Work of F. Edwin Elwell, Sculptor," illustrated, by B. O. Flower; "The Social Situation in Canada," by Rev. Charles Aubrey Eaton; "Utopia," by Prof. A. E. Dolbear, of Tufts College; "The Republic of Man," by Prof. Nathaniel Schmidt, of Cornell University; "Is Our Universe Primarily Spiritual?" by D. E. M. Babbit, LL. D; the Poems of Emerson, by Mr. Charles Malloy; several excellent Christmas poems and an original and striking story by Mrs. C. K. Reifsnider. The publisher's announcements for 1900 are exceedingly attractive.

The new magazine which the Macmillan Company will issue on January first is to be called the International Monthly. Edward Rod will lead with an article on "Later Evolution in French Criticism;" Prof N. S. Shaler will follow with "The Influence of the Sun upon the Foundation of the Earth's Surface;" Prof. John Trowbridge on "Recent Advance in Physical Science;" Norman Hapgood on "The Theatrical Syndicate;" Charles de Kay on "The Association of American Artists." It is evident that the editors intend to keep the scope of this work in actual living touch with the current movements if one can judge from the two last articles, while the scholarship of the other writers promises well for a particularly interesting first number.

A notable feature of the Outlook for December 2d is an article called "Through Filipino Eyes." This is an authorized interview with the President of the Filipino Junta at Hong Kong, obtained by Mr. Phelps Whitmarsh, the special representative of the Outlook in the Philippine Islands. It is the first authoritative statement of the official position of the Filipino leaders published in an American newspaper. $3.00 a year. The Outlook Company, New York.

Any one who wishes to obtain, within the shortest compass compatible with completeness, the history of the relations between the South African Dutch and British Government, which have culminated in the present war, will find it in a remarkable article contributed to the December number of the North American Review by the Rt. Hon. James Bryce. Beginning with the exodus of the Boers from Cape Colony in 1836, and the circumstances responsible for that event, Mr. Bryce narrates the experiences of the emigrant farmers in their sanguinary conflicts with the savage natives and in their contests and diplomatic disputes with Great Britain, to the moment when President Kruger issued the ultimatum which precipitated the hostilities now in progress.

A. B. Frost, the well-known illustrator of rustic types, has just completed a series of pictures of "People We Meet in the Country" for the Ladies' Home Journal. The first of these, "Coming Home for Christmas," is published in the December number of that magazine. Others are "At the Country Store," "When the Circus Comes to Town," "At the Railroad Station," "The Town Meeting," etc. Each will be printed in full-page form and will be an interesting feature of the successive issues of the journal.

The Christmas Ledger Monthly is freighted with original and delightful Christmas pictures, stories and sketches. The cover offers a sunny Christmas morning picture of a little boy in his nightgown, leaning over the foot of his bed, with his arms filled with toys, and brimming over with happiness. The frontispiece is a little girl playing grandma, with a cap, and spectacles on her nose, and with dolls in her lap, making believe to sew the skirt of a dress. Ian Maclaren's article, "When Scotchmen Have Their Full Rights," has never been surpassed by this brilliant writer. It is a keen analysis of Scotch character and a humorous satire of their crochets.

This is also the best line to points in Kentucky Tennessee, Georgia and North and South Carolina

Winter in the South.

The season approaches when one's thoughts turn toward a place where the inconveniences of a Northern winter may be escaped. No section of this country offers such ideal spots as the Gulf Coast on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad between Mobile and New Orleans. It possesses a mild climate, pure air, even temperature and facilities for hunting and fishing enjoyed by no other section. Accommodations for visitors are first-class, and can be secured at moderate prices. The L. & N. R. R. is the only line by which it can be reached in through cars from Northern cities. Through cars schedules to all points in Florida by this line are also perfect. Write for folders, etc., to GEO. B. HORNER, D. P. A., St. Louis, Mo.

GOODRICH.

Joseph Carter Goodrich was born in Amherst County, Va. April 14, 1825; died at Wentzville, Mo., Nov. 29, 1899, aged 74 years, 7 months, and 15 days. Dr. Goodrich has lived in Wentzville, Mo., for several years, where he followed the profession of dentistry. He made the good confession many years ago and united with the Church of Christ near Millwood, Mo., and lived a consistent Christian all his life, loved by all who knew him. His funeral was preached here in the M. E. Church, South, by the Methodist minister, Bro. Majors, Thursday Nov. 30th, to a large congregation of relatives and friends, who mourn his departure.

United with the Christian Church in Payson, 1866, of which he was a faithful member until his death, which occurred Nov. 23, 1899. He was 85 years, 2 months and 13 days of age. He was an elder in the church at Payson for a number of years. The funeral services were conducted at the house; Elder C. Edwards officiating. C. EDWARDS.

Payson, Ill.

LEWIS.

Kate E. Eaton was born in Lawrenceville, Ill., December 25, 1836. She was married to William M. Lewis April 16, 1854. She was immersed into Christ June 6, 1857. She was ever afterward a faithful, conscientious Christian, always ready to do with her hands, or her means, to her ability in the interest of the gospel of her Lord. In all her Christian work she was nobly and devotedly aided by her Christian husband, of whose companionship she was deprived by death February 4, 1882, from which bereavement she never fully recovered, and the religion of Jesus was to her more and more a sweet consolation, and she consecrated herself more and more to the church and Christian work. For some years she was district president of the C. W. B. M., and did much efficient work in organizing, and is well beloved by the auxiliaries all over the district. She leaves three Christian sons to hold in remembrance the life of a loving and devoted mother. They rejoice to-day in the thought that that mother truly trusted to the Pilot of Galilean Lake to pilot her frail bark into the port of everlasting peace. Happy they for having had such a mother. Faith in womankind beats within their blood, and trust in all things high comes easy to them. She fell asleep at 8 A. M., Saturday, November 4, 1899. Such a beautiful death! She fell upon the walls of Zion, called, like a watchworn, weary sentinel, to put off her armor and rest in heaven.

"In her we saw a Christian saint
In triumph wear the Christian chain;
No fear lest she should swerve or faint,
Her life was Christ, her death was gain."

McMILLEN.

James B. McMillen was born in Brown County, Ohio, February 18, 1828. In 1849 he emigrated to Hancock County, Ill. In 1854 he was united in marriage to Margaret S. Evans. To this happy union was born seven children, all of whom are still living. About 1868, while living at Burnside, Ill., he united with the Church of Christ, under the preaching of J. H. Garrison. Bro. McMillen, who had been married three times, leaves a wife, a brother and one sister, besides his children, to mourn his loss, but not without hope. Bro McMillen had been a man of considerable means, and had been instrumental in erecting several houses of worship, and for sometime had been an officer in the church at Wilcox, Mo., where he died, November 22, 1899. Funeral services were conducted at Wilcox by Davis, of Albany, Mo., and Siberell, of Pickering, Mo., after which the remains were laid to rest about two miles south of Wilcox. J. E. D.

[The editor, under whose preaching Bro. McMillen confessed Christ many years ago, remembers him distinctly as a worthy disciple and citizen, and tenders his sympathy to the bereaved family.—EDITOR]

MILLER.

Uriah K. Miller was born in Kentucky, December 16, 1825; died November 27, 1899, aged 73 years, 11 months and 11 days. He united with the Christian Church in November, 1850, and faithfulness and honesty in the sight of God have characterized his life. He was an elder for twenty seven years and the "father" of the church at Marcelline Ill. The growth and progress of the church have, in a large measure, been due to his untiring devotion. His calm, serene method of living and the nearness of his life to God made him one whom "God delighteth to honor." He leaves a wife and three children, nineteen grandchildren and five great-grandchildren. He has been a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST ever since it was first issued. The funeral service was largely attended. The writer preached the funeral. W. S. LOCKHART.

REDD.

The beautiful Thanksgiving day, Thursday, Nov. 30th, which dawned bright and clear, closed in clouds of sorrow for the Christian people at Platte City, Mo. At 10 o'clock P. M. the sad intelligence was telephoned from house to house that Sister Kate Redd, wife of Pastor E. B. Redd of the Christian Church was dead. She had passed a busy and happy day helping the ladies of the Christian Church serve their annual Thanksgiving dinner and supper; was among the last to leave the dining room, and ran down stairs hurriedly to get her wraps which she had left in the chapel. Instead of opening the door leading to the chapel, she made the mistake of opening a door a few feet further south, from which a stairway led to the furnace room below. Down this stairway she plunged, striking her head against a stone wall, and cutting a fatal wound in the back of her head. A few minutes later the janitress, on her round to put out the fire and lights, discovered the lifeless form on the basement floor and gave the alarm to Bro. Redd and a few ladies who were awaiting her return. Medical aid was summoned only to confirm the terrible fear that life was gone. The pure, sweet spirit of Sister Redd was called away without a moment's warning; almost without a pang of physical suffering. Those of us who knew her well and loved her for her beautiful Christian character are sure she heard the summons gladly and was ready to meet her Lord. "Be ye also ready; for, at such an hour as ye know not the Son of Man cometh." An appropriate and impressive service was held at the parsonage Friday morning, after which the remains were taken for burial to Danbury, Conn., Sister Redd's childhood home. Sister Kate C. Davis was born in Danbury, Conn., Sept. 23, 1858. Was united in marriage with Rev. E. B. Redd May 22, 1883. These young Christians came to Missouri immediately after their marriage, where they have lived, toiling hand in hand, for the Master. Five boys have blessed their happy union. The first born, John T., lived only fifteen months. Edward M., Alexander Davis, Frank Fannon and Leslie Goff are left to mourn the loss of a sainted mother. May the good Father keep and bless them. During the two and one half years of Brother Redd's pastorate at Platte City he and his estimable wife have won the love and confidence of the entire community. Her sudden death is mourned as a personal loss in every home. The shadow of a great sorrow is upon us.

MRS. T. W. PARK.

SOLOMON.

D. W. Solomon was born in Macoupin County, Illinois, Dec. 15, 1844. Became a Christian at the age of 16 years. Died Oct. 10, 1899. He was married to Lucy J. McPherson, March 25, 1873. To this happy union was born one son, who is left to comfort his mother in her sorrow. Bro. Solomon was a charter member of the church at Virden, Ill., and was one of its deacons for a number of years. In 1887 he moved with his family to Wichita, Kan., where he was again deacon until he removed to Kingfisher, O. T., in 1889. Here he led in the organization of the church and the building of a nice house of worship, and from its organization until his death, he was a faithful elder. His remains were taken to Wichita, Kan., for burial. PERRY MCPHERSON.

The Baby went to Boyland

HE sat on my knee at evening,
The boy who is "half-past-three,"
And the clear blue eyes from his sun-browned face
Smiled happily up at me.
I held him close as the twilight fell,
And called him "my dear little son."
Then I said, "I have wondered for many days
Where it is that my baby's gone!

"I'd a baby once in a long white gown,
Whom I rocked just as do you;
His hair was as soft as yellow silk,
And his eyes were like violets blue;
His little hands were like pink-tipped flowers—
See, yours are so strong and brown;
He has slipped away and is lost, I fear;
Do you know where my baby's gone?"

Did my voice half break as the thoughts would come
Of the sweet and sacred days
When motherhood's first joys were mine,
With a shade of regret on my face?
For close round my neck crept a sturdy arm,
And the boy who is "half-past-three"
Said, "The baby—he went to Boyland,
And—didn't you know?—he's me!"

LESSON COMMEMTARY FOR 1900

For fourteen years this Commentary has been published, and each succeeding year brings out a volume more practical than the previous. The helps by Bro. Dowling are eclectic, with notes, comments, illustrations and suggestions gathered from many sources. In our study of the Scriptures, and especially in the preparation of our Bible lessons, we use many commentaries, and the Christian Lesson Commentary is always one of them. This book may be ordered from the Leader office.—Christian Leader, Cincinnati, O.

SCIENCE AND PEDAGOGY OF ETHICS.

I have examined with great pleasure and profit this "Text-Book" by my old Hiram friend, Harvey W. Everest, at present dean of the Bible College of Drake University. He has always been a favorite preacher and author to me, and I think I have a copy of all the books he has ever written in my library, besides many essays on a variety of subjects. Every preacher is or ought to be interested in ethics, which the author defines as "the science of duty—the science of right." Every preacher ought also to be able to teach ethics. Hence he should know the principles and methods on which correct instruction and training in morals are given. This book is the result of "lifelong devotion to the study and teaching of moral science and religion." Its principles have been tried in the school room and its methods practiced with the living class. The "text-book" is not, therefore, a theoretical treatise, but the result of actual practice. It is a book which every preacher ought to study, and especially those who are about to enter the great field of the Christian ministry. F. M. GREEN.

FREQUENCY OF THE LORD'S SUPPER.

Have you read this book? If not you should send at once for a copy. The price is only 25 cents, postage paid. It is convincing argument in favor of frequent and regular observance of the Lord's Supper. A careful reading of this work will inspire greater reverence for the observance of this ordinance of the church.

MOSES, THE MAN OF GOD.

This work is the latest from Dr. D. R. Dungan's pen and has just been published by the Christian Publishing Company of St. Louis, Mo. Dr. Dungan is so well known as the author of "On the Rock," that it is unnecessary to say anything in regard to his ability as a writer, further than to say that his reputation as an author and scholar is fully sustained in this new book. It is bound in latest cloth binding and the price is $1.00.

A Young Preacher Wanted.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST:—The newly organized Christian Church of Montgomery, W Va., desires to engage a minister.

It is confidently believed that there are many young preachers who would suit us and we them, if we could only be introduced to each other. We are hunting for a young single man who possesses a good knowledge of the Scriptures, with good ability as a speaker and a graduate of some one of our colleges, who wishes to do some postgraduate work toward a higher degree in connection with his ministerial duties. The church has a membership of forty-two members; it is thoroughly missionary, and though limited in number pays more per capita than any other church in West Virginia and the largest percentage present and participating in prayer-meeting. The church is anxious to work, the harvest here has been ripe for years, the pulpit is temporarily filled every Lord's day, but we are now trying to secure our first regular permanent minister. The church will not be able to offer a large salary, but because of its location it is able to offer exceptionally large opportunities for high study in West Virginia University, which has attracted more attention by recent rapid growth than any other educational institution in the country. There is no missionary field that will respond with larger yield than Morgantown to the labor of a young man whose heart is in the work of the Master.

Can you afford to do without it?

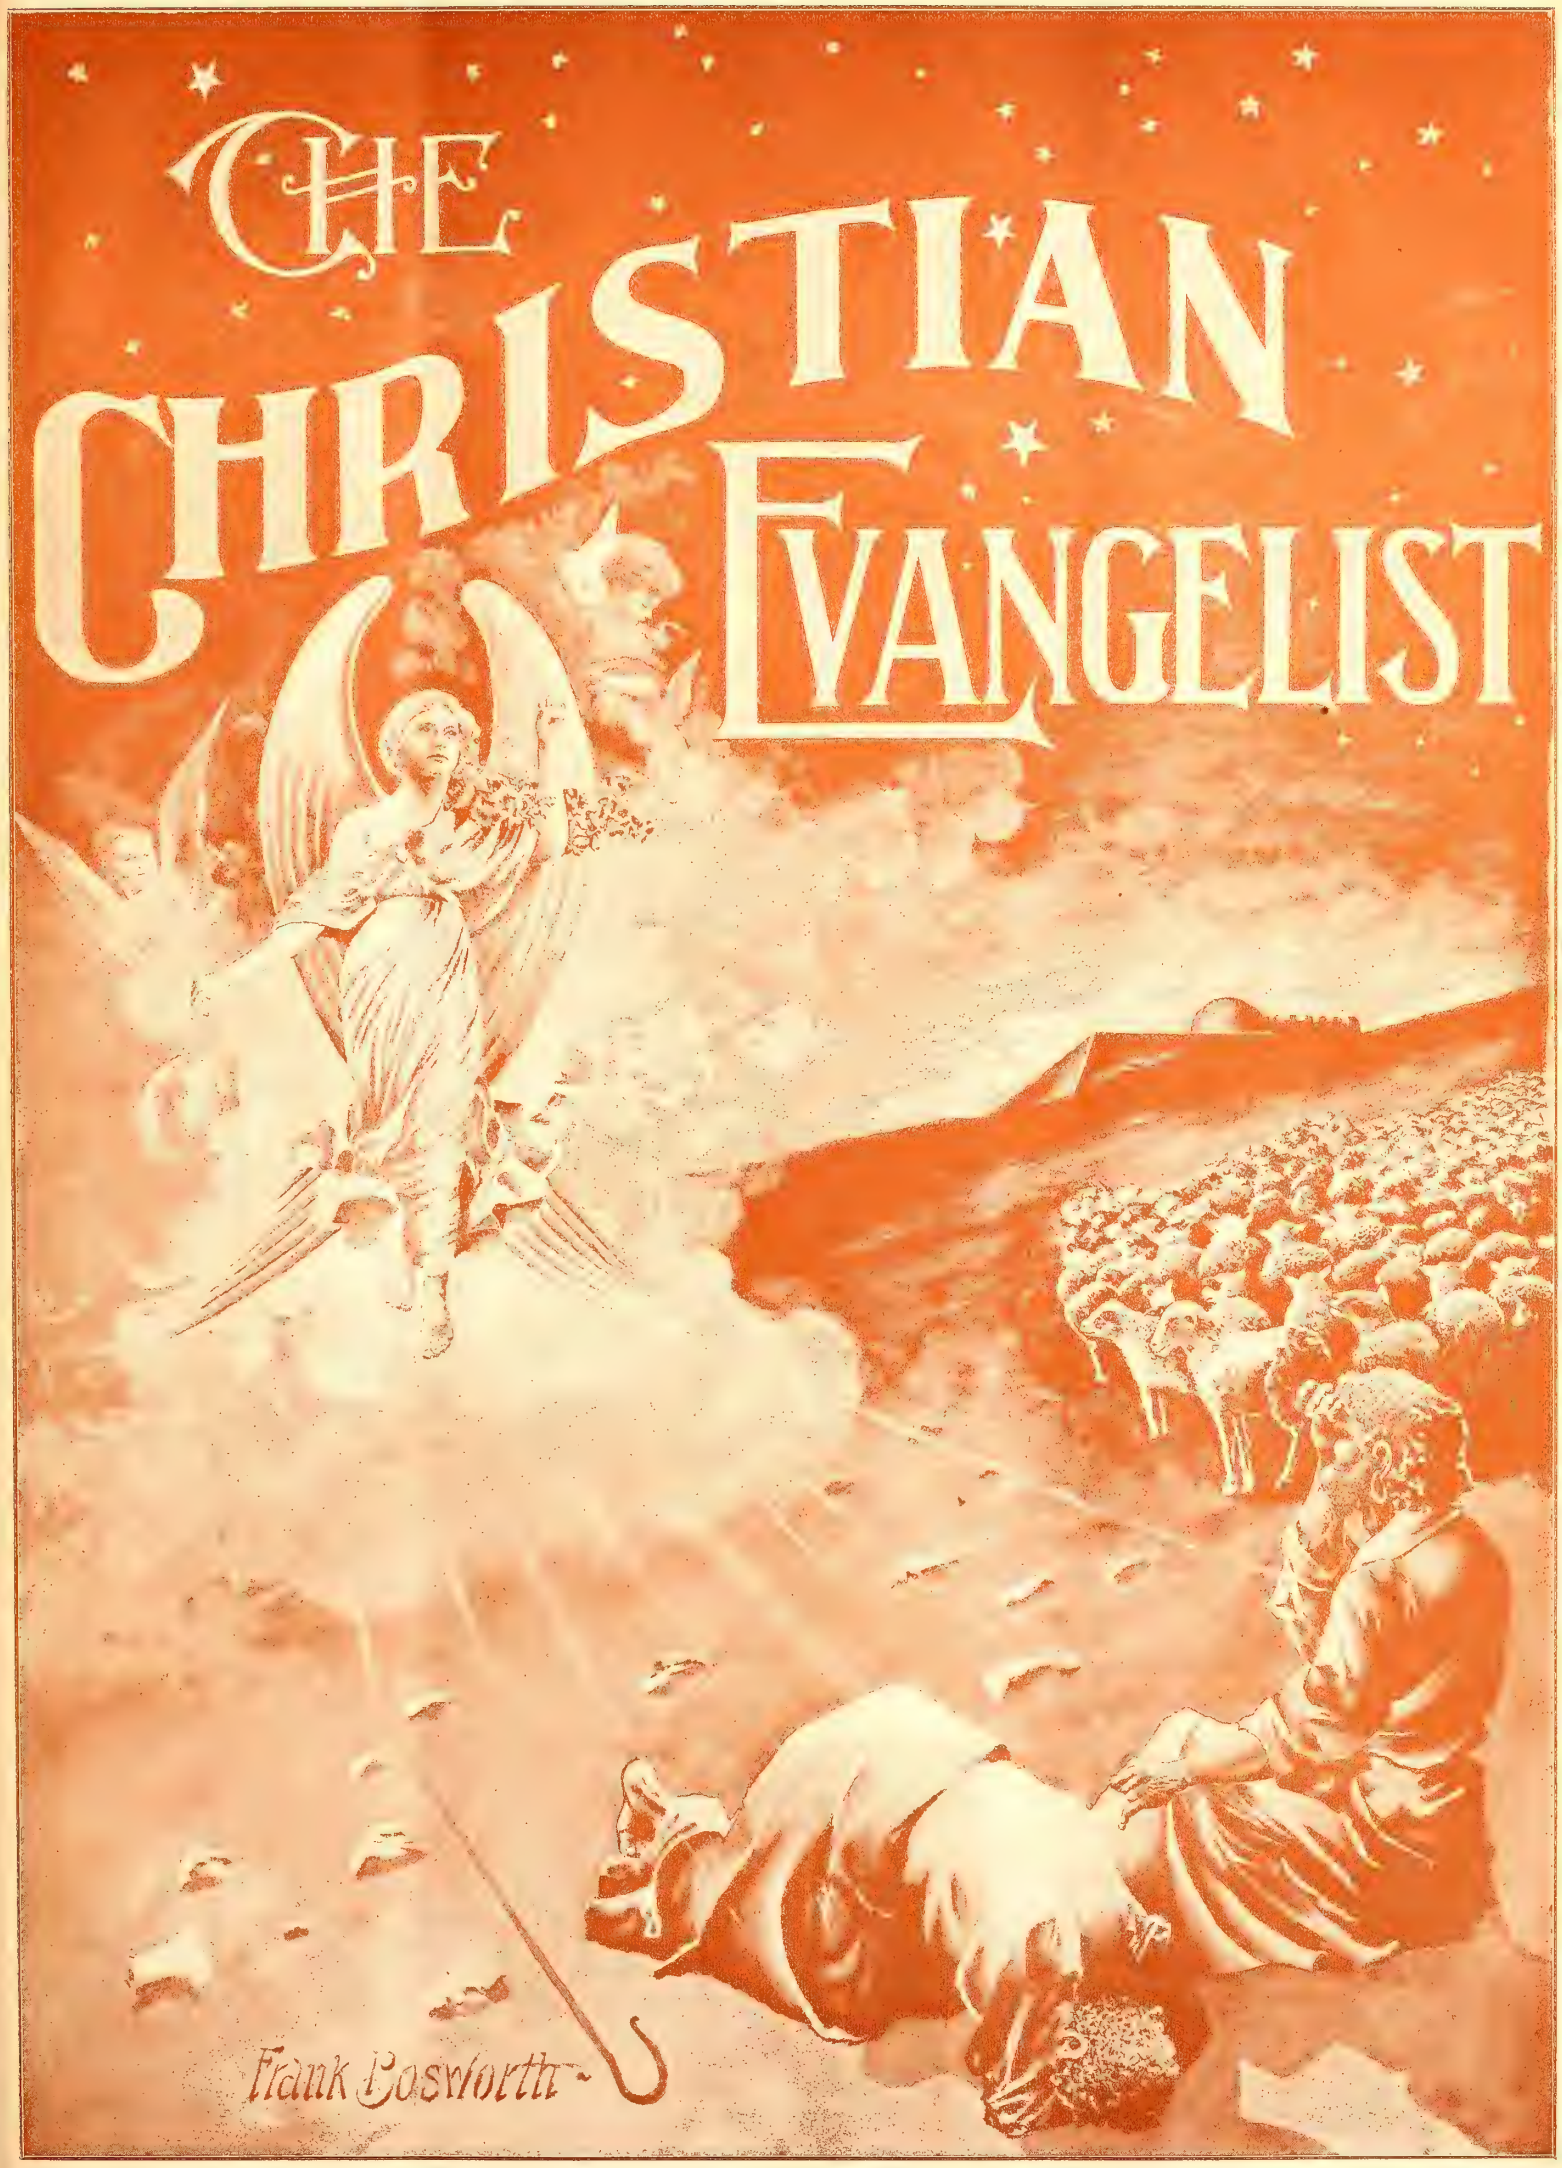
Now is the time to subscribe.

Do you want to earn a piano and at the same time help the cause of good literature in your community?

See our announcement on another page.

We wish that time would permit us to express to each one of the friends of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST our appreciation of their kind assistance and co-operation in extending the influence of our journal. But we will try to respond by giving to our readers a constantly improving paper, such as shall be worthy of the cause we represent.

We believe our friends will be best satisfied with such an answer.



Churches, Sunday-schools, Endeavor Societies and others interested in the spread of light and truth will do well to notice our announcement of a club rate of $1.00 in clubs of 50 or more sent to one address in one bundle. This is a very close offer and is made only in consideration of the expense saved in soliciting, mailing, keeping accounts, etc., necessary where papers are sent to individual addresses. Our subscription rate where papers are sent to individual addresses is $1.50, which is as low as is at all consistent with first-class quality.

PARAGRAPHS FROM THE PUBLISHERS 22

FROM THE BOOK DEPARTMENT.

Such expressions as a "wonderful bargain," "greatest offer ever made," etc., have lost their meaning. They have been so often misused that they attract no attention. Therefore we make use of no such phrase in speaking of our Special Bible Offer for the holidays. We are content to describe the book, state the price and let our patrons decide for themselves whether or not the offer is one worth accepting. Our Bagster Teachers' Bible (minion) is a beautiful book. It is bound in Syrian Levant, Divinity Circuit, Round Corners, red under gold edges, full leather-lined and silk sewed. It is printed on fine paper. It is in every way first-class and substantial. It should not be confounded with the Bibles that are being offered by many houses at alluring prices, for it is in every way superior. It has complete references, voluminous helps, concordance, maps, etc. It is the book that has been commonly sold for five dollars. We have a limited number on hand, not a shelf worn stock, but new books, which we will sell, while they last, at the extremely low price of two dollars, cash to accompany order, the postage paid by us. If you are dissatisfied with the book when you receive it you may return it and get your money back.

There are some Bible-school teachers and superintendents who have not yet secured their copies of the Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900. These should order at once, that they may be prepared for the first Sunday of the new year. We do not need to occupy space in praising this book, for it is advertised by the thousands who have used it and know its worth. The volume for 1900 is a neat, cloth-bound volume of almost 400 pages. The price is $1.00, or $9.00 per dozen.

Those of our readers who have delayed the purchasing of Christmas gifts until the last moment, and are yet in doubt as to what to buy, will doubtless thank us for a timely suggestion. A good book is always an appropriate and acceptable gift. We desire to especially recommend two little volumes by J. Breckenridge Ellis—"King Saul," and "In the Days of Jehu," historical romances written around Old Testaments characters. Mr. Ellis is a young author of rich promise. To compensate for physical weakness which would have made most men hopeless pessimists, nature has given him rare intellectual gifts. He is a poet, a musician and a gifted prose writer. He could not, if he tried, write a dull or uninteresting story. His books are destined to have a large sale. The price of "King Saul" is $1.00 and of "In the Days of Jehu," $ 75.

And then—speaking of suitable gifts—there are those ever-new and valuable devotional books by J. H. Garrison—"Alone with God," "Half Hour Studies at the Cross" and "The Heavenward Way." We have printed and sold edition after edition of these books—tens of thousands of copies—and yet the demand continues. They are now issued in uniform size and binding; price, 75 cents each, in cloth, or $1.25 each in full morocco and gold. The set of three, in cloth, is offered for $2.00; in morocco for $3 25.

The volume of Alfred Fairhurst, entitled "My Good Poems," is just from the press, a volume of 240 pages, neatly bound in cloth. Those who have read "Organic Evolution Considered," by the same author, will be curious to see his poetic productions. Price, postpaid, $1 25.

And let it be always remembered that we own and control the great body of books, tracts, pamphlets and other publications of the brotherhood, and that we furnish everything in the way of church, Bible-school and Christian Endeavor supplies. Address Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis.

A few well-chosen and well-directed words spoken now in behalf of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be productive of great good. To whom shall you speak them? To your friends and neighbors, to be sure. Talk until they "talk back" and say, "I subscribe."

Have you given attention to our offer of a splendid upright piano to the person sending us the greatest number of new subscriptions to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST? See our issues of November 30 and December 14 for particulars, and then write to us about it.

Since "pushing the button" has been introduced into the matter of religious journalism we may be excused for saying drop a dollar and a half in the slot and receive fifty-two copies of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST for the year 1900.

In view of the exceedingly low price at which the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is offered, the plans which we have made for the very best journal we have yet given to our readers, and the great advances made in the prices of the materials which are necessary in the production of this paper, we would again remind our friends and readers that we are depending upon their hearty co-operation in enlarging our list of readers. If you believe a first-class, up-to-date, representative advocate is desirable, there is only one effective way to show it, and that is by putting your shoulder to the wheel and encouraging our efforts.

Don't forget that we have only a comparatively few sets of the great Standard Dictionary (two volumes) which we are offering for twenty-five new subscribers to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGLEIST at $1 50 each. Every scholar knows what a splendid dictionary this is. It is first-class in all particulars, a recognized authority.

The books are solidly bound in morocco and have thumb index. If you want to know more about them, write to us, but do so at once. Both volumes sent absolutely free (except transportation charges from St. Louis) upon receipt of thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents for twenty-five new subscribers. The price of the books is twenty-six dollars.

You ought to be able to earn this splendid dictionary in a day Complete list of subscribers should be sent at once, as we cannot promise to hold these books for any one, as our stock is so limited.

Only a few more days and the year 1899 will pass into history. Its joys and its sorrows will alike become but memories to cheer or admonish us in our lives during 1900. We feel like saying a brief word in acknowledgment of the kind and earnest assistance rendered to this department of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, by which it is enabled to report that the year 1899 closes with the best subscription list we have had in years. We have always held that the helpful quality of the matter contained in this paper was the item of first importance, and we still believe this to be true, but without the aid of those who have acted as well as those who have written, the great improvements in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the year 1900 would have been impossible. A preacher is necessary in the conversion of the nations, but it is likewise necessary that he be sent, and the one who sends is equally as important as the one who goes We wish it were possible for us to suitably acknowledge to each one our gratitude for services rendered, but we will try to imitate the example of our Father who gives us new responsibilities in acknowledgment of duty well done, and invite the hearty co-operation of all in the great work of at least doubling our circle of readers for the year 1901. Your advice, suggestions and active aid are earnestly solicited.

All the books which we offer in combination with the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST are of first quality. We know they will please you and are certain that the offers we make are very cheap. It would not pay us to sell you something with which you would not be satisfied—we have been in the business a long while and expect to receive your patronge for years to come.

We are exceedingly careful in making our selections, being anxious to show conclusively that it pays to be a subscriber to the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. If there should be any fault or flaw in either the paper or the premiums you will confer a favor on us by letting us know at once.

Would it not be commendable for subscribers to begin the new year with their subscriptions paid up to 1901?

Do not have the silent but eloquent "yellow slip" gaze at you in reproach because of your neglect. Our present low price is made with the expectation of prompt payment. We must pay our bills promptly in order to buy at right prices. Every one can assist and encourage us in this way at least. For your own sake no less than ours, do not let your subscription fall in rrears. One year is not difficult to pay for. Two or three years' subscription may be a hard proposition to meet.

While you are remitting it will be easy to prevail upon your neighbor to subscribe with you.

This is our Christmas number. If you want your friends to enjoy it, send the paper to them for one year, ask us to enclose the last two numbers for December free, and we will do it. What a nice present a year's subscription to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, will make; something to remind the recipient of you fifty-two times next year. It will cost you only one dollar and fifty cents, and we will stop it at the end of the year if you ask us to when ordering.

Non-subscribers who read this are earnestly invited to join the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST reading circle for the closing year of the century by subscribing at once. Even if you have neglected this opportunity in the past, "it is never too late to mend." The door is open; we welcome you into the family.

What We Plead For

The Christian-Evangelist pleads for:

The Christianity of the New Testament, taught by Christ and his Apostles, versus the theology of the creeds taught by fallible men—the world's great need.

The divine confession of faith on which Christ built his church, versus human confessions of faith on which men have split the church.

The unity of Christ's disciples, for which he so fervently prayed, versus the divisions in Christ's body, which his apostles strongly condemned.

The abandonment of sectarian names and practices, based on human authority, for the common family name and the common faith, based on divine authority, versus the abandonment of scriptural names and usages for partisan ends.

The hearty co-operation of Christians in efforts of world-wide beneficence and evangelization, versus petty jealousies and strifes in the struggle for denominational pre-eminence.

The fidelity to truth which secures the approval of God, versus conformity to custom to gain the favor of men.

The protection of the home and the destruction of the saloon, versus the protection of the saloon and the destruction of the home.

CURRENT EVENTS.

There was considerable expectancy, and perhaps some apprehension, in certain quarters when the city of Haverhill, Mass., elected John C. Chase, an avowed Socialist, as its mayor. Mr. Chase's statement of plans and principles at the beginning of his administration gave assurance that he would not attempt to do anything radical or destructive. Evidently, the outcome has shown the sincerity of this statement and the sanity of his policy, for he was last week re elected to the same office against the combined opposition of Republicans, Democrats and Prohibitionists. The spread of Socialism in Massachusetts is further evidenced by the election of Charles H. Coulter, Socialist, as mayor of Brocton. In this case there was no fusion against the Socialist, but his plurality was nearly equal to the total vote for either of the other candidates. Municipal ownership is the most important feature of the policy advocated by these Massachusetts Socialists, and they seem content to go slowly and bring it about by the most orderly and least disturbing methods. It is this moderation and sanity which is winning adherents to the Social-Democratic party in Massachusetts. It it noteworthy that these victories are not among foreign populations or recent immigrants, but in cities where the native-born outnumber the foreign-born voters three and a half to one. The pertinent suggestion is made by a Republican leader that if the old parties want to hold their prestige they must adopt some of the reasonable and plausible planks of the Socialist platform.

An important development in Chinese administration is the creation of the office of Minister of Commerce in the Chinese Cabinet. Not only has there hitherto been no special officer of the government, whose duty it was to look after the commercial interests of the country, but there was an almost entire lack of that sort of governmental machinery by which that function could be performed, as it is with us, without such a minister. The Chinese representative at London, in announcing and commenting upon this appointment, says that it is an attempt to make the trade of China as desirable as possible to all nations, especially to Great Britain and the United States, who already surpass all other powers in the value of their trade with China. The Chinese Government is "doing what it can to meet the commercial views of the powers." It is particularly gratifying at this time, when the commerce with the Far East is being prized and developed by the Western nations, and when China herself seems to be in imminent danger of dismemberment, like an inert mass of valuable but unresisting material, to see that ancient empire shaking herself and showing some vital signs of appreciation of the situation. If there is one thing which can save China from partition among the great commercial powers of the world it is for China herself to open her own door and enter into the world of trade with a heartiness and intelligence which will remove all excuse for the partition of her territory. It is late, but perhaps it is not too late to avert this disaster.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court against the cast-iron pipe trust carries with it some important corollaries, although this particular trust is not of the latest and most approved pattern. It consisted simply in an agreement between separate companies to maintain the price of their product at a certain fixed figure. For example, when the city of St. Louis called for bids for 5,000 tons of cast-iron pipe, about three years ago, it chanced that St. Louis was in a section of the country covered by this agreement, and in that particular part of that section which had been assigned to the Howard Harrison Company of Alabama. This company submitted a bid of $24 a ton, which is $6 or $8 more than the current price at that time in parts of the country not covered by the agreement. To give an appearance of competition, the other companies which were in the agreement submitted still higher bids. The result was that the city was fleeced out of $30 000 or $40,000, which sum was divided among the companies in the trust. The court was eminently right in terming such an arrangement as this a "conspiracy." Such a simple scheme as this is comparatively easy to reach by law, but the up-to-date trust is a huge, consolidated corporation instead of a mere loose agreement between separate companies. The trust not only controls the various companies and plants, but actually owns them, and any attempt to restrict it, therefore, involves an apparent interference with the right to form business partnerships. It has been held by some that the opinion handed down by Justice Peckham in the case of the cast-iron pipe trust has no application to these larger and more dangerous corporation trusts. But we are inclined to believe that it has a very direct application. The principle upon which he bases his decision is that a contract or combination to prevent competition and enhance values constitutes an illegal restraint of trade, even though trade in that commodity continues to be carried on at the higher prices. In other words, the illegality of a trust or combination is to be tested by its results and not by the technicalities of its organization. If the price of a commodity is artificially raised by the restraint of competition, the agency which has effected that result is a trust guilty of unlawful restraint of trade, whether it is a mere agreement between separate companies or a gigantic corporation which has absorbed the companies. This seems to us to be getting to the heart of the matter, and it is along this line that restriction of trusts is to be made effective, while legitimate combinations of capital for more economical business administration, or for carrying out enterprises which are necessarily on a large scale, will not be interfered with.

The situation in South Africa has passed from the serious to the critical state with the British Empire. Three notable reverses have followed in quick succession, viz., that of Methuen at Magersfontein, Gatacre at Stormberg and Buller at Tugela River. This last reverse has aroused England to desperation. Not since the Indian mutiny in 1857-'8 has England had such a shaking up. Nobody expected Buller to be defeated in the relief of Ladysmith. But now, at the end of two months of war, England has lost in all an estimated loss of more than 7,500. Ladysmith, Kimberly and Mafeking are still beseiged, and an army of more than 100,000 men in all stands blocked until it can be reinforced. The effect of these reverses has greatly strengthened the Boers and all England now expects a general uprising of the Dutch in Cape Colony. Then again, this is a severe shock to the prestige of proud old England and she is feeling the humiliation most keenly. But she has not lost her courage. All must be retrieved at any cost is now her ambition, and to this end she is calling out her entire army and navy. She feels that she must not only save her claims in Africa, but give due warning to other European nations as to other colonies and claims, and this she talks of doing by putting her entire navy in commission. As to South Africa it seems that a new campaign is to be inaugurated on a plan commensurate with the demands of the situation. Baron Roberts, of Kandahar, has been ordered to the field to take charge of the campaign, with Lord Kitchener as chief of staff. Baron Roberts is 67 years old, but he is a man in whom all England has confidence; also in Lord Kitchener. Both men are renowned in their military achievements, and to these men England now looks to redeem her claims in Africa and her name before the world as a military power. The effect of these reverses upon the stock exchange of the world has been alarming. In London a veritable panic prevails and the effect in New York is alarming. There was a reported shrinkage in stocks on Monday in New York of $100,000,000. Several heavy failures have also been reported—two being in Boston. The government is, however, doing all that it can to prevent further disaster by offering to purchase more bonds and to increase its deposits in New York national banks. The best relief, however, that can come to the rescue, it is said, will be the success of British arms in South Africa. But this now seems improbable for some weeks at least. Without interference, however, England will recover her losses sooner or later.

Never, in modern times at least, have British armies suffered within one week three such defeats as those which were inflicted last week upon the three divisions of the British force in South Africa at Magersfontein, Stormberg and the Tugela River. The result is that Methuen's force is seriously crippled and the relief of Kimberley thereby rendered increasingly improbable; that by Gen. Gatacre's ignominious and costly defeat upon British soil, the danger of a general anti British uprising in Cape Colony is vastly increased, while Gatacre himself is discredited as a tactician; and that, by the defeat of Buller's army at the Tugela River, the situation in Natal becomes positively desperate and the relief of Ladysmith is indefinitely postponed. The total British losses in these disasters amount to 2,754, killed wounded and missing. The absence of complete and detailed accounts of the engagements makes it impossible to pass any final judgment upon the generalship displayed, with any degree of fairness. But, judging from the meagre but doubtless accurate official dispatches, it seems that the tactical errors of the British commanders contributed almost as much to the result as did the skill and bravery of the Boers. In all three of the engagements there was an attack by British troops upon a Boer position of unknown strength. In no case does it appear that there had been any sort of an adequate attempt to develop the position of the enemy and determine his real strength. In each case the attack was made in solid column formation upon an enemy armed with long-range artillery capable of obliterating whole platoons and companies before they could get within rifle range. It is true that it was not known that the Boers had so good an equipment of artillery at these points, but it is equally true that there was no reason to assume that they were without it. Besides, it was known that they were armed with long-range rifles and that they were fatally accurate marksmen. The method of attack employed by three British generals could have been successful only against an enemy armed with muskets and without effective artillery. The agitation in England resulting from these series of defeats is extreme and will doubtless lead to the sending of more reinforcements. It has already been officially announced that, inasmuch as Gen. Buller will be fully employed in Natal (and so he will, it seems), General Lord Roberts has been appointed commander-in-chief in South Africa with General Kitchener as his chief of staff.

The six days' debate on the Currency Bill in the House of Representatives turned out to be a very tame affair. To begin with, it was in most respects a conservative measure, with few specially vulnerable points of attack. It was not easy to make objections to it, unless one were willing to attack it in its essential principles from the standpoint of the free silver doctrine. The Democratic side evidently felt that it was not worth while to engage in any such hopeless enterprise, and consequently the debate dribbled on without incident or amendment. But this very calm was the occasion of a violent outburst on the last day of the debate, when the Democracy was taunted with not daring to offer a free silver amendment or substitute. A lively scene ensued, in which the Republican side had the satisfaction of observing that there was not entire agreement on that question among their opponents. The exhibition of this fact was doubtless the motive which prompted Republican representatives to fling the challenge. The vote on the bill was taken on Tuesday, according to the previous agreement, and it was passed without amendment by a vote of 190 to 150. Eight Democrats voted with the majority. The Republican National Convention in 1900 will be held in Philadelphia.

The National Civil Service Reform League held its annual meeting in Indianapolis, during the past week. It was a gathering of able, earnest and representative men. The most prominent members of the League were Carl Schurtz, who was re-elected president of the League; Charles J. Bonaparte, of Baltimore; Richard H. Dana, of Boston, and Herbert Welsh, Philadelphia secretary of the Indian Rights Association. The point of greatest interest in the meeting was the attitude assumed by the League toward President McKinley. The President by his order of May 29, 1899, removed a large number of government positions from the operation of the civil service tests. Months before this time he had declared his intention to do this. Representatives of the League had reminded him of his pledge that in the matter of civil service reform "no backward step will be taken," and in reply the President had stated that it was his intention to place upon the list of the classified service a larger number of officers than those removed from it. Up to date that promise has not been fulfilled; neither has there been any adequate explanation of the failure to fulfill it; and the Civil Service League unanimously believes that a decided backward step has been taken, in spite of the promise of the administration—the most serious backward step since the civil service law was put in operation.

THE ADVENT.

The coming of Christ is the supreme fact of all history. That event divided all time into two distinct eras. It changed the current of the world's life. As we view the fact in the light of the condition of the world at that time and of subsequent developments, Christ's advent seems to have been the one necessity. Neither Hebrew monotheism, Greek culture nor Roman law had sufficed to arrest the downward moral tendency of society, which was corrupt at its very core. Without the coming of some new force to start the world forward and upward on a new career, without the breaking out of a fountain of hope in the desert of human despair, without the entrance into the life of man of a new element of power, there seemed to be nothing to look forward to but the ultimate ruin of the race. It was in this extremity of need that Christ came into the world.

The manner of Christ's coming is not less significant than the fact itself. "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." It was the union of God and man. It was the manifestation of what has been aptly called "the human life of God." The incarnation is the corner stone of a true theology. It is the true starting-point of all right religious thinking. Accepting the supreme fact of the incarnation—the fact that God really did manifest Himself in human form—the whole history of redemption from the beginning of prophecy to its blessed consummation becomes both credible and intelligible. Denying this fact we are at once plunged into a wide sea of human speculation, with no guiding-star but rationalism by which to direct our course into the desired haven. This fact, therefore, is the true touchstone of a rising or falling church, a true or false theology.

Beginning at other starting-points than this many have erred, and concerning the faith have made shipwreck. Why should one stumble at the supernatural element in the Old Testament who has accepted the transcendent fact of the incarnation? If nineteen centuries ago God manifested Himself in a human personality, so filling all His normal human faculties with the divine life and power that it could be said of Him that "in Him dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily," why should it be thought incredible that this same God, whose heart has always yearned for the redemption of the race, should have begun, in the earliest history of man, to prepare the way for the advent of His Son? The superhuman events connected with Israel's history—what are they but the footsteps of the Almighty marching down through the centuries and preparing the way for His entrance into human life and into human history by way of the incarnation and the cross? All rationalisiic methods of dealing with Old Testament history, outside the limits of legitimate critical investigation, have their origin, as it seems to us, in the failure to accept, fully and unreservedly, the New Testament doctrine of the incarnation. Without this fact human history is an enigma and human destiny a riddle.

As for ourself, we believe in the fact of the incarnation without reserve or compromise. We believe that with Christ God has entered into human life in a new and peculiar way. We accept no superficial or rationalistic interpretation that robs the incarnation of its divine mystery and the cross of its divine significance. We believe that with the birth of Jesus in Bethlehem human life has taken on new meaning and has been clothed with new dignity. The Child whose birth was heralded by angels has risen, through earthly poverty, persecution and suffering to the right hand of God, where He is both a Prince and a Savior. We believe the whole world is yet to be gathered under His banner and that this world is one day to be a Christian world, over whi He is to reign forever.

"Already that divine teacher, Christ, hath touched poverty and clothed it with power; hath touched marriage and surrounded it with romance and love; hath touched the soldier and turned him into a hero and patriot. And now He is here to touch work and wages, making them sacraments of human fellowship. Christ is also here to enrich each life with new and impressive forms of mental and moral beauty. He offers men new powers and impulses. The force of the ship is in the trade winds that sweep it on, and the joy of the sailor is in the harbor toward which he moves. Not otherwise the dignity and majesty of life are in the divine motives that sweep the soul upward and in the sublime destiny toward which the soul moves. In days gone by this divine teacher put justice into law, ethics into politics, love into religion, and planted immortal hopes upon the grave. Having girded the heroes of old for their tasks, He steps into the new era, to continue the line of prophets and heroes."

It is this that gives to Christmas its significance. It is this that sheds its kindly influence on human hearts, at this season of the year, when we hear once more, in clearer and more distinct tones than at any other time of the year, the refrain of the angelic song, "Peace on earth among men of good will!" Let all our homes be filled with cheer and gladness, and the Christ of Bethlehem be a guest at every fireside. Let the churches be filled with grand hallelujahs of praise to Him who came to our relief when we were "without God and without hope in the world." Let the bells in all the steeples ring out their notes of gladness because "God so loved the world that He gave us His only begotten Son." In remembrance of God's great and unspeakable gift to us let us be the bearers of such gifts as we have to the poor and needy, not forgetting to do it all in His name whose advent we celebrate. To all our readers, far and wide, we send our hearty Christmas greetings, with the hope that this coming year may be one of supreme triumph for Him whose coming has done so much to bless the world.

VALEDICTORY AND CONGRATULATORY.

Having been for a number of years editorially connected with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, it seems entirely proper, upon retirement from its pages, I should speak a word or two to editors and readers, with whom I have been so long and so pleasantly associated. On March 1, 1888, I entered the office of this paper in succession to the lamented J. M. Trible, where I continued for more than two years. During my residence in England, from 1890 to 1895, I was the English correspondent and wrote under the title, still continued by my brilliant successor, of "English Topics." On returning from the Old Country at the beginning of '95, I resumed editoral connection with the paper and have written for it regularly in this capacity up to the end of the present year of grace, 1899. I have had great delight and joy in this work and in the character and success of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

I am not retiring from compulsion or because I have received an invitation to hand in my resignation, but because I can not very well continue to assist in editing two of our papers, and providence seems to indicate that I shall render the little assistance I am able to give to another journal. Besides, the increasing burdens of a large pastorate render it necessary that I should do less in the line of literary production.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was my favorite paper long before I had any connection with it, and of course, my association with the work and the able men who have shaped its policy has not diminished my affection for it. The conception of its editor as to what a religious paper ought to be in spirit and tone and breadth and advocacy of essential truth has been my own for many years. Its enlightened policy and hospitality to research and investigation, its opposition to crystallization and all sectarianism, inside and out, its fidelity to the fundamental plea of the Disciples, without the addition of damnatory clauses to an infallible creed, and its kindly treatment of friends and foes alike, have met the cordial approbation of a host of intelligent readers. They have been, in the language of Dr. Johnson concerning a female friend, "fundamentally sensible, sir."

Editor Garrison has not thrust upon us the offensive assumption that he had settled every question in the universe, with the added insinuation, as a whip-cracker, Woe betide others who do not settle it in the same way! While loyal to Christ and sound in the faith he has allowed us liberty of opinion and interpretation, without assuming the office of critic and censor and general regulator to stand between us and danger as though the brotherhood hadn't sense enough to keep itself out of danger without a South African critical and theological censorship to tell it how! What we all want is a religious journal that "finds" us, to use the expressive word of Coleridge, and that feeds us, not on the husks of polemics and orthodox shibboleths, but on the milk and meat of the Word intelligently expounded and applied to our souls. What little I tried to do, in my poor way, along with the other editors of the paper, was in this direction. Our labor has not been in vain in the Lord.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has been the precursor and the prophet of a better day in the religious journalism of our people. It reminds us in contrast to earlier journalistic enterprises that there is a necessary evolution in the history of the journalism of all intellectual and spiritual movements. If it is true that the old American Christian Review established and unified our people on first principles, and the Christian Standard, under Isaac Errett, opened the way to more enlightened views on questions of expediency, and progress and organization for the evangelization of the world, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, in this apostolic succession, is lifting us on to a higher plane of liberty, catholicity, and may I not say, of spirituality and consecration also? Those who are the most directly under the influence of this paper while growing in loyalty and likeness to the Savior and in an intelligent appreciation of the Word of God, are rapidly and correspondingly outgrowing the intolerance and narrowness which are as apt to characterize an unsectarian movement as any other. It has taught us the great lesson, that of all heresy the want of love is the worst, and that the charitable view of men and things is nearly always the true one.

The editor may be congratulated on the turn affiairs have recently taken in connection with the paper, as they will give his personality a wider and freer scope in relation to the future of our journalism, and at the same time hold the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on its upward way as an intelligent and loyal exponent of our principles that we are not ashamed to hand to our neighbors. In withdrawing my connection from this paper as one of its editorial contributors, to devote the time I have for writing to a coworker in the same great field of religious journalism, I do so with undiminished affection for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and the good men who are conducting it, and with every assurance that it will be able to get along first-rate without me!

J. J. HALEY.

Editor's Easy Chair.

The Easy Chair has discovered a new remedy for insomnia. Others may have discovered it for themselves before us. Tossing about on our bed a few nights since, restlessly, with a mind full of many cares and anxieties, vainly courting sleep, we decided to get away from it all and take an excursion backward into the sunny days of childhood. There are bright spots in the memories of most of us which stand out with distinctness above the dull, commonplace events which have long since faded from our recollections. There were days back there when life seemed to be specially bright and joyous. Some one, it may be, had done us a kindness, or it may be that we were permitted to do a kind, unselfish act to another. It may have been the meeting with some friend, the going on some journey, the inspiration that comes from new scenes and surroundings. Or it was the mastering of some mental task at school with a word of approbation from the teacher. But whatever the episode, it served to brighten the day or the hour and to write itself indelibly on memory's page. And so, beginning with our earliest recollections, we came along down through the years, recalling this and that pleasurable incident, rejecting all others, until, brooding over these brighter scenes of the long ago, the vexing cares of the present were banished, the mind found peace and the wearied brain found rest in sleep. This is our prescription. We give it to our readers as a Christmas gift.

While we are availing ourselves of the benefit of the foregoing remedy, it would be a good thing to multiply the bright spots in the lives of those about us, and particularly of the children. He who makes a child happy, even for an hour, has perhaps made a bright page on its memory to which it will look back with pleasure after the lapse of many years. This is a good time of the year, by the way, to make the little ones happy. Christmas is preeminently the children's festival. Not by mere gifts, which are well enough in their way, but more by the spirit and atmosphere of the season, and by the happy incidents which we can crowd into it, will we make the day a memorable one to childhood. Above all, let us see to it that our children, at this season of the year, hear the wonderful story of the Christ-child. Nothing will interest them more, and nothing will more touch their hearts and imaginations. The facts and incidents connected with the birth and early life of Jesus, related under the spell of the Christmas season, will make an indelible impression upon the hearts of the young. Nothing is easier than to enlist the children in any unselfish plan for helping others less fortunate than themselves and for sharing their happiness with the poor and needy. They rapidly catch the Christ-idea, and there is no better way of celebrating Christmas than to make it the occasion of kind, unselfish acts and gracious ministries toward those who are not in condition to reward us in kind.

Speaking of Christmas, it hath a charm which is all its own. There is a spirit about it which belongs to no other day. This spirit seems to pervade the very atmosphere. It manifests its presence in the old and in the young, among the rich and among the poor. It dimples the cheek of childhood with its smiles, and smooths out the wrinkles of care from the brow of age. It softens the heart of even the miser, and opens the mind of the man of the world to other sentiments and influences than those which ordinarily occupy his thought. It breeds a spirit of hopefulness, of sublime optimism. It is almost impossible to be pessimistic at Christmas time. There seems to be hope for the world, even its most degraded parts, when we view it in the light that shines from Bethlehem's star. Somehow we feel that the humanity which is capable of embodying divinity and manifesting the glory of God has a glorious destiny. It is difficult to believe that the wonderful condescension involved in the birth of Christ is not to have its glorious consummation in a redeemed world. Millions of the human race, wherever the gospel has gone, will be making pilgrimages, in imagination, this Christmastide, to Bethlehem's manger. And as they gaze upon the quiet town, resting beneath the Syrian sky, they will feel with Phillips Brooks:

> "O little town of Bethlehem,
> How still we see thee lie!
> Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
> The silent stars go by;
> Yet, in thy dark streets shineth
> The everlasting light:
> The hopes and fears of all the years
> Are met in thee to-night."

The Easy Chair would carry into the homes of all the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST its words of Christmas greeting and good cheer. Life has its minor keys, of course, but this is not the season to sound them. There is more help in good news than in bad. We know some of the bad things in the world, but we believe in the good things which are here also. We believe the good is to triumph over the bad, the right over the wrong, the true over the false. We are optimistic because we are Christian. Accepting Christ's birth as a fact and believing in his mission we cannot be other than optimistic. What we wish for ourselves and our readers is that we may keep closer to the heart of Christ, and look at this world through His eyes and love it with His love and seek to save it as He sought to save it, through the ministry of love. Banished forever from our hearts the spirit of hatred, of narrowness, of bitter prejudice, of selfishness, of cruelty and oppression, which make up so largely the world's woes, and welcome, thrice welcome into our hearts, our homes, our churches, our social and political life, the Christ of Bethlehem, the Savior of the world!

Hour of Prayer.

BALANCING BOOKS.

(Rom. 14:7-13; Rev. 20:12-15.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Dec. 27.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: Man's relationship to God and his personal accountability to Him are the most solemn facts of life, and there are times and seasons when the soul should face these great facts with special care, to ascertain its true condition and probable destiny.

No remark of Daniel Webster is quoted more frequently than his reply to the question as to what was the greatest thought which had ever entered his mind, that it was the fact of his personal accountability to God. This is the lesson emphasized in the Scriptures selected for our meditation on this last prayer-meeting evening of the old year. It seems a fitting time for us to take our moral reckoning and look the fact of our personal accountability to God full in the face, and determine what are our responsibilities and the tendencies of our lives.

Perhaps some of us have been living during the year as if the manner of our life was something which concerned ourselves alone. The question of our relationships may have received little or no attention. This lesson reminds us that "none of us liveth to himself, and none dieth to himself." Every one's life is a bundle of relationships. First of all and highest of all, he is related to God who created him and to the Lord who redeemed him. This creation and redemption create obligations which cannot be ignored. "For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." If we are the Lord's, then we are to do His will and devote ourselves to the advancement of His kingdom. To what extent have we done this? How many opportunities of service have we neglected? These are question that come home to every heart.

And then there is the fact of our relationship to one another. "Why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at naught thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of God." This places us all on a common basis. We are all brethren and Christ is our Master. "Let us not, therefore, judge one another any more; but judge ye this rather, that no man put a stumblingblock in his brother's way, or an occasion to fall."

How does our account stand in this respect? Have we been helps, or hindrances to others? Has our conduct been a stumblingblock in the way of any brother struggling to live a better life? Have we helped any one into a better life?

At this closing season of the year, when men are balancing their books, it is eminently wise that we should look very narrowly into the question of our moral accountability. That is a graphic picture given us in the Book of Revelation, of "the great white throne" with one seated thereon "from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them." The great and the small were gathered before that throne, and "the books were opened;" and "another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of the things which were written in the books, according to their works." Is it true, then, that every one must face his record in the judgment day? Is it true that every thought, word and act of our lives is recorded in the book of God's remembrance, and, perhaps, engraved on the pages of our own memory to be revived in the light of the judgment day? If this be so, then it is, indeed, a very solemn thing to live, and every day of our lives should be lived in the light of these truths. What would the record be if we were called to-night to give an account to God? Thank God for the promise of forgiveness and the blotting out of our transgressions! But have we turned away from our sins and sought and found God's forgiving mercy? If so, we have reason to be grateful that at this last prayer-meeting of the present year we can "read our titles clear to mansions in the skies."

PRAYER.

"O God, our Father, from whose hand
The centuries drop like grains of sand;"

Thou who hast given us life and being, and whose unfailing mercies have crowned our days, we thank Thee that Thy guiding hand hath preserved us through another year, and that we are permitted once more to gather here in this prayer-meeting, where Thou hast so often met with us, and where we have received new strength and new light for life's burdens and duties. As we look into the question of our accountability to Thee we must confess that we have fallen short of our duty and of our privileges, and we humbly implore Thy forgiveness. In view of our relationship to Thee and to one another and our accountability to Thee, we desire to dedicate ourselves anew to Thee that the coming years of our lives may be more faithfully devoted to Thy service than the past years have been. And we ask Thee for strength to carry out this desire and purpose of our hearts. In Christ's name. Amen!

Questions and Answers.

Referring to a recent discussion reported in the St. Louis Republic, and commented upon in one of our religious journals, permit me to ask a few questions:

1. Is it an essential item of faith to believe that the Ten Commandments were literally written on two tables of stone by the finger of God, or is it sufficient to accept the divine authorship of these commandments?

2. What could Bro. Waters mean by the statement that "inspiration is a universal gift?" Jason.

1. Concerning the matter of the writing of the commendments on the tables of stone, we have this record in Ex. 34: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Hew thee two tables of stone, like unto the first, and I will write upon the tables the words that were on the first tables which thou brakest" (v. 1). Moses prepared the stones and took them up into Mount Sinai, and the Lord descended and repeated the commandments, and then we have this record: "And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread nor drink water, and he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments" (v. 28). Here it is said, in the first verse of this chapter, that the Lord would "write upon the tables the words that were on the first tables," and in v. 28 it is said that Moses "wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant." The easy and commonsense way of reconciling the two statements is that Moses wrote the words upon the tables under the direc- of the Lord. We should say, therefore, that it was not an article of faith to believe that God wrote them with his own finger, without human instrumentality.

2. Commenting upon this statement at the time the paper was reviewed, the editor of this paper in a brief speech said that he supposed Bro. Waters meant by inspiration being a universal gift that the Holy Spirit was no longer limited to a chosen few, as under the old dispensation, but that, according to Joel, it was "poured out upon all flesh," i. e., all nations and classes of people were to be its recipients; in other words, the gift of the Holy Spirit was to be coextensive with the reign of Christ over the hearts of believers. There is a sense, we said, in which all Christians are illuminated, guided, strengthened, inspired by the Holy Spirit; yet, we remarked that we did not suppose Bro. Waters would deny, and if he did, we should certainly not deny the unique character of the inspiration of the apostles and other inspired writers of the Bible, who received a special measure of the Holy Spirit for the special purpose of communicating the mind of God to men. We have seen nothing and heard nothing from Bro. Waters to indicate to us that he denies the unique character of that inspiration which gives to the Bible its supreme place among the books of the world as an authentic revelation of the character and will of God. If this statement misrepresents his view of inspiration, our columns are at his disposal to set himself right. We do not understand that the divine origin of the Decalogue was called in question. It was simply a question as to the manner or method in which it was given to Moses. There were statements in this paper which, from our point of view, needed modification or explanation, but they have been magnified unduly in the religious journal referred to as is its wont.

[Since the foregoing was written Bro. Waters, having read it, expresses his approval of it as a fair statement of his position.—EDITOR.]

A Christian preacher has recently made the statement that the people who were destroyed in the flood did not have souls, hence they were extinguished, or annihilated the same as cattle. I cannot accept this statement, and ask your opinion.

A Subscriber.

The statement is not only without any scriptural support, but is in direct contradiction to what the Bible teaches concerning the nature of man. Man was made in the image of God, and this implies the possession of a spirit, a self-conscious personality, that differentiates man from all lower orders of beings. In addition to that statement, which is assumed as true everywhere in the Bible, Peter tells us that Christ visited the unseen world, in spirit, after his crucifixion, and preached to the antediluvians, which he could not have done had they ceased to exist. At least this is the most satisfactory interpretation of that passage; but even if we take the interpretation, that Christ preached to the antedeluvians through Noah, this fact contradicts the view of man stated by the preacher, for why should a preacher of righteousness preach to people who have no souls, any more than to cattle?

In John 5: 39 Christ, speaking to those Jews who rejected him, referred them to the Jewish Scriptures, saying, "In them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." What could they have known of "eternal life?"

Very little, compared with what has been revealed through Christ; and yet, the more spiritually minded of the Jews, particularly among the sect of the Pharisees, had some ideas of the life beyond, and believed in the existence of the spirit and the resurrection of the body. All the light they had upon this subject they had gleaned from the Old Scriptures, and they had doubtless learned to esteem those passages which seemed to support their faith, even while they rejected the testimony concerning Christ, through whom life and immortality were to be brought to light. It was for this inconsistency that Jesus rebuked them.

What moral difference is there between the individual Pharisee who prays conspicuously in crowded places and blatantly thanks the Lord that he is not as other men, and the (religious) newspaper Pharisee which unceasingly informs the public, through its columns and by means of circulars, that it is the defender of genuine, simon pure, original orthodoxy, and that though others (said others being not named, but clearly indicated) may teach heresy and tolerate heretics, its readers are to be congratulated that it still remains firmly grounded in the faith? The moral difference, as it seems to me, is nil, or if there a difference, it is in favor of the former. The ancient Pharisee sought only to gain the praise of men; the pharisaical journal desires that, and also winds up its apostrophe to itself with, "Now is the time to subscribe! Secure our S. S. supplies!"

O.

Our querest answers his own question in a way that leaves little to be added. There is no great difference between playing the Pharisee for the praise of men and doing it for revenue.

The Provident Association of this city, now permanently located at 1623 Washington Ave., is one of the strongest agencies for the relief of the suffering poor of this city that we have. It has been in this work so long that it has the work well systematized and is prepared to know the merits of the applications made for relief on short order. Since this association began this benevolent work, forty years ago, it has spent the large sum of $858,777.58 not, of course, including clothing and other forms of relief. Such an institution as this is a blessing to hundreds of families who, but for their assistance, would perish each winter. It is well for the people, too, that a reliable agency like this can be had through which to administer to the worthy poor.

Reformation of the Nineteenth Century

NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE CHRISTIAN WOMAN'S BOARD OF MISSIONS.

First Decade.

LOIS A. WHITE.

The national officers elected were, president, Mrs. Maria Jameson; recording secretary, Mrs. Sarah Wallace; corresponding secretary, Mrs. C. N. Pearre; treasurer, Mrs. O. A. Burgess.

The constitution adopted, besides providing for a national executive committee and its guidance, stated: "Any number of women contributing annually may form a society auxiliary to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions." Thus at the very beginning of the association provision was made for that dual work which is of God—development of Christian character in its members and sustaining workers in mission fields. The following, from the message of the first president to her first executive committee meeting, sets this forth:

As little, insignificant rivulets from unnoticed, hidden springs, running together make the constant larger stream, which hurrying on with swollen waters bears its steady contribution to the great river, so will the mites of the poor widow and the pennies of the children and the dollars of the salaried women and the larger sums of those of independent incomes, flowing together make one great stream pouring forth to water and refresh the fields of missionary labor.

To find and set in motion the smaller sources of means is a special object with us; partly because in a country like ours where few are very rich and as few are abjectly poor, it is the most natural and efficient way to raise money; and partly, that all may share in the reactive benefit that comes to those who contribute to a good cause. By a most admirable and beneficent arrangement of Providence the poor can have equal experience with the rich of that remarkable saying of the Master: "It is more blessed to give than to receive," for in his service, unlike that of man's, we receive immediate reward, not according to the amount of labor expended nor in proportionate per cent. upon money invested, but according to the spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion that prompts the offering. He who alone knows the hearts of the children of men will give each one a just reward. This also suggets the answer to a common question: "How much is it my duty to do for this great work?" Christ alone can answer. It is his own work. He calls to us individually, teaching us in this, as he does in almost everything, by parable and example rather than by direct precept. Pointing to his own life of toil and deprivation he says in tones of strangely mingled entreaty and command: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me;" and again: "He that loveth father or mother, son or daughter, more than me is not worthy of me." Our neighbor cannot judge for us. We have only to account to and satisfy Him who knows perfectly our circumstances, ability and hindrances.

Before leaving Cincinnati in October, 1874, it was reported the treasury contained $430. A resolution was passed to invest all money received until enough accumulated to send a missionary to Jamaica.

The acquirement of informed minds and grateful, enlisted hearts was earnenestly sought in the full confidence that such would deligt themselves in the law of the Lord and so discharge their stewardship as to place in this treasury the portion of his money he wished thus used. The last recommendation in a committee report, presented in the convention of 1875, clearly bespeaks the purpose and controlling spirit in the work:

It is recommended that we ourselves as individuals give more attention to reading whatever will elevate and encourage a missionary spirit in our own hearts and that we gather all the information possible upon the subject, so as to make ourselves magazines of inteligence; that we consecrate ourselves more entirely to God and his service; that we practice more self-denial, spend less upon our tastes and appetites (for dress and for luxuries) and devote the money thus saved to the missionary fund, over and above what we as members of the society have pledged ourselves to contribute annually.

By the adoption of the report these sentiments were made the voice of the C. W. B. M. Is it not well to recall this now, if at all inclined to think that the payment of 10 cents per month fulfills all obligations? A committee upon "Best Methods of Raising Money" reported in the same convention:

While this committee advises the adoption of all legitimate means for raising money and realize this matter must be left to the discretion of each congregation; we recommend, above all, the regular monthly contribution as best calculated to perpetuate our interests and inspire our zeal.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions is neither a home nor foreign society alone. As far as practicable those terms are absent from its nomenclature. It tries to stand close enough to the side of our Savior to obtain his view of the value of a soul as such, regardless of nationality and the clime in which it dwells. "The field is the world," and the reaching of all parts of it with the gospel is limited only by lack of men and women, and funds for the prosecution of their work. For convenience in designation each section of the world-field, taken up for cultivation, is called a field. The first one of these to be entered was the Island of Jamaica, upon which decision was made at the time of the organization of the association. The treasurer's report in October, 1875, showed $1,439.23 in bank. This sum seeming to justify the employment of a missionary, W. H. Williams, of Platte City, Mo., was chosen, and on the 29th day of January, 1876, sailed from New York with his wife and child. He went to the field that had been chosen because the C. W. B. M. felt called to send a shepherd to those small congregations organized in Jamaica by J. O. Beardslee that had been without a pastor ever since the A. C. M. S. had been unable to contine his support. Reaching Kingston Feb. 5, Bro. Williams received a cordial welcome. He preached next day to about thirty in the old, dark, leaky, unpainted chapel, on Church St. About three years later he wrote conerning A. S. Darby, employed as teacher in the school at Oberlin:

Bro. Darbey is doing exactly the work required, and it is at once a culmination of our plan and prophecy and pledge of success. Competent natives, doing the work among their own people, is what we hope one day to see everywhere, and now realize in his case. He and another black boy obeyed the gospel upon hearing the first sermon I preached in Jamaica.

At the beginning of his ministry there Bro. Williams found in Kingston about 50 Disciples still faithful, all colored or black, poor, and most of them very poor. Most of the congregations in the country had ceased meeting, but a good many individual members remained faithful. The period from this time to the close of the first C. W. B. M. decade, 1884, saw, not rapid, but steady, substantial growth. Only a part of the elements and workers therein can be noted. The teaching set forth that hand in hand with conversion and church membership must be taken up the duty and habit of systematic giving to the Lord's cause. Almost withot exception the members pledged the payment of a spcified sum weekly toward the current expenses and the repairs that were needed immediately. Some young men sought Bro. Williams' directing and rendered him regular assistance in the prayer meetings, teachers' meetings, Sunday-schools, preaching in various parts of the city and in visiting from house to house, in which he was constantly engaged. One of these was James Tilley, a young English merchant who had been raised in London and converted by C. H. Spurgeon, under whome he became an active worker. Within a few months after hearing Bro. Williams preach Bro. Tilley, who had been living in Jamaica about two years, united with us and went vigorously to work in schools and cottage prayer-meetings, and also in studying the Word with a view to preaching. He gave up his business and offered himself for mountain work. In March, 1878, he was located at Oberlin to labor under direction of the board, which agreed to pay him $250 per year for a term of three years. In in the spring of 1879, on account of the failing health of his wife, Bro Williams returned to the states. Bro. Tilley then took charge in Kingston, receiving $250 addition to his former salary. Isaac Tomlinson having been sent from the states in 1880, to follow W. H. Williams in the Kingston work, Bro. Tilley returned to Oberlin. The record shows him, in 1881, in charge of Bitoe and Mt. Zion, where he had organized Sunday-schools. He made occasional visits to Oberlin, where Bro. Tomlinson had rebuilt the chapel. Bro. Tilley was in employ of the C. W. B. M. till 1884, when he came to America to take a course of Bible study, and in a few years died here.

A young woman from Indianapolis, Ind., was presented to the National C. W. B. M., in Cincinnati, in October, 1878. The president said concerning her: "Jennie G. Laughlin goes to open a school in Kingston. . . . She goes also as a missionary to the women of that island, who are sorely needing such teaching, advice and companionship as she is able to give them." Her school opened with 125 pupils of all ages, grades and colors. Patiently and faithfully did Miss Laughlin conduct the school, relying on divine strength in the difficulties of the pioneer period of an enterprise; but in 1880 wrote her decision to return home on account of failing health. Her death occurred Sept. 27, 1881.

Upon hearing Miss Laughlin must leave Jamaica the board employed Marian Perkins to go to Kingston as teacher in the training school, to sail Sept. 28. The committee on Jamaica work presented in the 1881 National C. W. B. M. Convention: "Miss Perkins' school has lately passed examination on a very good grade, receiving $123 grant from the government." Her resignation, which was presented to the board in December, 1881, was accepted with a request it should not go into effect until the beginning of the coming year, that we might not forfeit the government grant by dropping the school before that time.

Bro. Tomlinson, who had resigned his Jamaica work for Nov. 1, 1881, was requested to extend the time to Jan. 1, 1882.

December 10, 1881, W. K. Azbill, Louisville, Ky., accepted the call to take the Kingston work and sailed February 3, 1882. At that time we had in Jamaica, besides the Kingston church, four country churches and four out stations, with about 700 members; also, several Sunday-schools and day schools. Not far from this time the Kingston congregation removed from the old Church St. chapel to its present home, 70 Duke St.

In 1880 this board appropriated $750, salary for Miss Crease, assistant to Mrs. Delaunay, of the French mission in charge of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. In 1881 it appropriated $500 for this assistant, and $500 also for an assistant for Prof. Delaunay. In April, 1881, it employed Elder and Mrs. Faurot to labor among the freemen at Jackson, Miss.

The corresponding secretary in the annual report presented in October, 1878, stated:

A feeling of almost restless anxiety to undertake more than we are doing at present is manifested. With the growth of our society and the increasing zeal of those most actively engaged, we feel sure, with added diligence, of being able in a few months to extend our labors in some other direction, besides carrying on the Jamaica work.

In October, 1881, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the Foreign Christian Missionary Society decided to to co-operate in establishing a mission in India. In September, 1882, the company sailed. We sent four young women, Ada Boyd, Mary Kingsbury, Mary Grabiel and Laura V. Kinsey. G. L. Wharton and L. Norton and their wives were sent by the Foreign Board. They located at Hurda, Central Provinces.

What is now well known as "the Western work" of the C. W. B. M. had the convention of 1881, possibly its first impetus in an address upon "Mission Fields in the West," written by Isaac Errett (in his enforced absence delivered by A. I. Hobbs); followed by the president's most earnest appeal for such work, and recommendation that it soon be opened.

The first permanent work undertaken by our board in the homeland was in Montana. In 1882 our only two churches in that territory, at Helena and Deer Lodge, under the leadership of Wm. L. Irvine and Marsena Bullard, proposed to the board that they would raise $1,000 provided we would furnish an additional $1,000, to put an evanelist in the field.

J. Z. Taylor went for six months, beginning June 1, 1883. He recommended that the work be divided between two men, giving Helena to one and Deer Lodge and Butte City to the other, as these two districts lay upon different sides of a mountain range. In October, 1883, M. L. Streator and Galen Wood, both of Ohio, took charge of the Helena and Deer Lodge churches respectively. Neither had a church building, but each congregation met in a courthouse. Helena had thirty-eight members, Deer Lodge forty-three. Each congregation proceeded to build a house of worship the next year. Also, in 1884 congregations were organized, and church houses were begun in Corvallis and Anaconda, with W. D. Lear minister at the former and J. L. Phœnix at the latter place, and preaching was begun at several other points.

In May, 1877, the board decided to preserve all life membership payments as a permanent fund, the interest on which should not be used for five years. The following month Jno. S. Duncan, Indianapolis, was elected trustee for this fund. The first life membership certificates were issued to Mrs. H. Goe and Miss Rosa Goe, in April, 1878. In October, 1879, the endowment fund from life memberships was reported $1,020.50, loaned out. Two years later the interest upon the endowment fund was dedicated permanently to the support of heathen missions.

Until 1883 we had no literature of our own, either permanent or current. True, the editors of our church papers from the first gave us freest use of their columns for the promotion of our work, and these favors were gratefully accepted, but a paper wholly devoted to our mission interests had been greatly needed all the time. Lack of means prevented our starting it until in in May of this year, the first number of the Missionary Tidings was issued, edited by Mrs. M. M. B. Goodwin. It was a small, four-page, monthly paper. Mrs. Goodwin's health so failed during the summer that she resigned in September following, and a publication committee, Mrs. L. A. Moore and Mrs. S. E. Shortridge, were placed in charge of it.

THROUGH NATURE TO GOD.*

E. S. Ames.

The above is the title of a recent volume by John Fiske. It is a fitting companion every way to the same author's "Destiny of Man" and "Idea of God." These books, particularly the latest, are refreshing indications that the long strife between religion and science is rapidly ceasing, not because either side is giving up, but because each finds its own essential truths in the other.

The three subdivisions of "Through Nature to God" treat of the Mystery of Evil, the Cosmic Roots of Love and Self-sacrifice, and the Everlasting Reality of Religion. With reference to evil Mr. Fiske holds that it cannot consistently be ascribed to any source which necessitates a dualistic view of the world. Science teaches the unity of nature. He is convinced that "the whole universe is animated by a single principle of life, and whatever we see in it, whether to our half-trained understanding and narrow experience it may seem to be good or bad, is an indispensable part of the stupendous scheme." From this position evil is looked upon as having a necessary function in the world. If we had never known anything but goodness, how could we ever distinguish it from evil? If there were no color but red, it would be exactly the same as if there were no color at all. If our palates had never come in contact with any tasteful thing save sugar, we should know no more of sweetness than of bitterness. If we had never felt physical pain, we could not realize physical pleasure. In the same way, without knowing that which is morally evil, we could not possibly recognize that which is morally good. But from the general analogies furnished in the process of evolution we are entitled to hope that as the soul approaches its goal and man comes nearer to God, the fact of evil will lapse into a mere memory, in which the shadowed past shall serve as a background for the realized glory of the present.

The second problem treated is that of moral ends in the cosmic process. Nature works in such a way as to appear wantonly wasteful of life. If we confine our attention to the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence, we are not likely to arrive at any satisfactory conclusions with reference to the cosmic process being ethical. But when the process of evolution is stated in a way to include the development of human life, then the natural selection of physical variations is powerless to explain the facts. The physical differences between man and the apes are not great. But the moment we consider the minds of man and ape, the gap between the two is immeasurable. For psychological man you must erect a distinct kingdom; nay, you must even dichotomize the universe, putting man on one side and all things else on the other. At this point Mr. Fiske elaborates his own special contribution to the doctrine of evolution, in pointing out the significance of the long duration of infancy peculiar to man. Moral ideas and sentiments are found to arise through the formation of the clan and family which become necessary in the protection and care of infancy. The individual is obliged to give himself up to the common life of the clan, and thus altruism supplants egoism, and the world of ethics arises. In this way the ethical process is not only seen to be part and parcel of the cosmic process, but its crown and consummation. "Subtract from the universe its ethical meaning, and nothing remains but an unreal phantom, the figment of false metaphysics."

Mr. Fiske does not believe that ethics can be separated from religion, and therefore he proceeds in the third section to show how science emphasizes the everlasting reality of religion. He shows that the Latin idea of a transcendent God, remote from the world and only occasionally manifesting himself by interferences with the order of nature, is giving way to the Greek idea of God as immanent in the world of phenomena. Religion postulates three things —the existence of God, the immortality of the soul and the ethical significance of the unseen world. These three elements are essential to religion, but the further question is raised, Is the subject-matter of religion something real and substantial, or is it a mere figment of the imagination? "All the analogies of evolution, so far as we we have yet been able to decipher it, are overwhelming against the latter supposition. To suppose that during countless ages, from the seaweed up to man, the progress of life was achieved through adjustments to external realities, but that then the method was all at once changed, and throughout a vast province of evolution the end was secured through adjustments to external nonrealities, is to do sheer violence to logic and to common sense." "Of all the implications of the doctrine of evolution with regard to man, I believe the very deepest and strongest to be that which asserts the everlasting reality of religion."

Throughout the whole book the reader is impressed by the vast scientific knowledge, the absolute frankness and the deep convictions of the author. One may differ from him in several details, or even on the fundamental doctrine of evolution, and still find much refreshing encouragement in such a thoughtful and positive interpretation of modern scientific thought. A careful reading of this little volume will create a taste for other writings of the author.

THE MINISTER AND HIS LIBRARY.

W. J. RUSSELL.

1. The Bible, in the Hebrew and Greek as well as in the English Revised Version, should have the most prominent place. It is the one text-book above all others with which the minister must be acquainted. The time is coming, if it be not already upon us, when a man who can handle his English Bible as a thoroughly familiar student, acquainted with its contents, only can, will be more in demand than the most accomplished scholar who, with all his gettings, has not yet acquired a real knowledge of that book. No man can be regarded as an educated man unless he is familiar with this book. Professor Huxley says: "It is written in the noblest and purest English, and abounds in exquisite beauties of literary form." John Ruskin, expressing his view of the Bible, says: "It is the grandest group of writings extant in the rational world." In these words we have a noble tribute to the intellectual greatness of the Bible. But it has other claims upon us than its power to stimulate mental culture. It is inspired of God. It is "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." The churches have a right to demand of every minister, after he shall have spent some years in his calling, that he be well acquainted with all of God's Word, and that he be able to rightly divide it. This accomplishment may be acquired by the common English student of the Bible, and is one of the sources of power observed in many men of limited education. When, however, such men come to deal with verbal criticism it is impossible that their criticism should be as reliable as if they could read the original. There is nothing more certain, however, than that both they who can read the original and they who cannot should spend much more time in the continuous reading of the Scriptures. The Bible is a systematic book and appeals to man's highest rationality, and must be studied according to system and the law of progressive development. "The Canterbury revision of the New Testament should now totally supplant the King James version, not only because it is a great improvement as a version, but because it is the only representative in English of the corrected Greek text. A man is not safe in venturing upon the exegesis of a single passage by the aid of the old version until he shall have compared it carefully with the new; and rather than be continually making these comparisons, it is better to at once adopt the new into exclusive use."

2. Books bearing directly on the Bible should have the next place in the minister's library. His first duty is to preach the Word, and in order to do that acceptably he needs, not books on theology, but commentaries, lexicons, and such helps as will assist him to a clear understanding of the Scriptures. Many commentaries are not needed; but be sure to have a good commentary on every book of the Bible. The Pulpit Commentary is among the best. Its exegetical and homiletical sections are marvels of condensation, point, and spiritual insight. Matthew Henry's Commentary contains much wit and more wisdom, and should be read for its style and matter. The People's Bible, by Joseph Parker, abounds in stimulating ideas, and will be found very helpful to every minister. Special commentaries on individual books of the Bible will be found helpful. Perowne on the Psalms is a standard work. The Treasury of David, by Spurgeon, is particularly valuable for its Puritanic lore. McGarvey's New Commentary on Acts is among the best. Professor Lindsay on Acts of the Apostles is clear and helpful. Word Studies in the New Testament, by Vincent, is very valuable, as it endeavors to put the mere English student of the New Testament on the level of the Greek student. Keil's Introduction to the Old Testament, Weiss' Introduction to the New Testament, Gloag's Introduction to the Pauline and General Epistles, are indispensable. Then, too, no library should be without such books as Smith's Bible Dictionary, Sinai and Palestine, Thompson's The Land and the Book, Coneybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of Paul, Edersheim's Life of Christ and Isaac Errett's Evenings with the Bible.

3. The department next in order is that of theology and philosophy. These two studies go over the same ground and have the same end in view. To Christian Dogmatic corresponds Philosophy of Religion; to Christian Ethic corresponds Moral Philosophy or Philsophical Ethic. The doctrinal part of Church History, since the Christian era, runs parallel with the History of Philosophy. They cannot be indifferent to each other, but are either friendly or hostile. If they disagree, the fault lies not in philosophy or theology as such, but in the imperfection of the philosopher or theologian. They proceed from the same God of truth, and will ultimately meet in perfect harmony. Theology is limited to the sphere of religion or the relation of man to God. Philosophy has a much more extensive range of subjects, and embraces God, man and nature; it is as wide as the spiritual and material universe. It is the science of causes and principles. It asks, in popular phrase: What am I? What is this about me? What is there above and beyond me? The results that a man reaches in seeking answers to these questions constitute his philosophy. Theology starts from revelation and the consciousness of God; philosophy starts from reason and self-consciousness. Theology is in possession of the truth; philosophy is in quest of truth. The former rests on the revealed Word of God, the latter on the laws of thought. The minister needs to be a student of each. His library need not be extensive, but it should be choice in the selection of books for this department. The two great types of theological thought, Armenian and Calvinistic, should at least have place. Dr. Charles Hodge's theology will give the one; Watson's Institutes of Theology the other. The Place of Christ in Modern Theology, by Fairbairn, is one of the greatest works of the century, and should not be omitted from the student's theological list of books. The Old Faith Restated, a work edited by J. H. Garrison, gives a fresh and independent restatement of the great truths and principles of Christianity as they are apprehended, held and advocated by representative men of the Current Reformation to-day. In philosophy there is no better work to begin with than Professor George T. Ladd's Introduction to Philosophy. By far the best work for the purpose of getting a knowledge of the whole field of philosophy is Ueberweg's History of Philosophy from Thales to the Present Time, translated by Prof. George S. Morris, with additions by Dr. Noah Porter. Passing from the historical point of view it will be well to have a selection of the classics on the subject—Lock's Essay Concerning Human Understanding; Kant's Critique of the Pure Reason; Butler's Analogy; the Duke of Argyll's famous Trilogy, The Reign of Law, The Unity of Nature and The Philosophy of Belief. The best book written partially from the point of view of Mr. Spencer is Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy, Based on the Doctrine o Evolution, with Criticism of the Positive Philosophy, by John Fiske. It is Spencerism made more intelligible and, if possible, less objectionable. Spencer's Data of Ethics, by Malcolm Guthrie, is one of the ablest pieces of sustained philosophic criticism produced in the century.

4. History should next have place. The church histories claim, of course, precedence. History in general is described by Diodorus as "a handmaid of Providence, a priestess of truth and a mother of wisdom." This is true in the highest degree of church history. It has special value for the minister of the gospel, giving him a broad and comprehensive view of the rise and progress of the kingdom of God from the beginning to the present time. For the general history of the church, the minister's library should contain Neander, who combines in a wonderful degree scholarship, edification and spiritual insight; Schaff, our American Neander, but superior to him in interest and in having at command the latest researches. It is a standard work, which every minister should own and study; written in an attractive style; and gives unsurpassed bibliographical information on all points. George P. Fisher's History of the Christian Church is concise and comprehensive, and will prove valuable as a text-book. For a fine survey of the preparations of Christianity and of the conditions of the Greek and Roman world, Fisher's Beginnings of Christianity should be purchased. Dr. Uhlhorn's interesting and suggestive work, Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism, is of great value in de scribing the period of universal persecution. The best general survey of the Reformation within easily managed limits is the work of George P. Fisher, The Reformation, which is comprehensive and eminently readable. But the field of history to be covered in a minister's library is wider than that of the church. The field is the world. No man's education is complete without the careful reading of Herodotus, Xenophon, Thucydides, Tacitus, Rollin's Ancient History, Grote's History of Greece, Gibbon's Decline and Fall of Rome, Hume's or Macaulay's History of England and Bancroft's and Lossing's History of the United States. Neither should the minister neglect such books as Schlelge's Philosophy of History, if he would understand the principles underlying what Carlyle terms "the record of remarkable actions." The writings of John Fiske should be read by every student of history. The History of America, by Justin Winsor, and The Constitutional and Political History of the United States, by Dr. H. Von Holst, are highly recommended to the student of American history. The minister who possesses and masters these books will be rich in historical knowledge. "Surely, no one who aspires toward a high culture," says Pierson, "could ask a more delightful and elevating employment than with such aid to explore those winding paths of time, through all of which are seen the solemn traces of the march of God."

EVOLUTION OF THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

No. I.—Discipleship.

J. FRAISE RICHARD.

Solomon uttered a fundamental truth relative to human character when he declared that "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches," and that it is "better than precious ointment."

Christianity attaches equal importance to names. In fact, it considers them of the highest significance. Jesus, the great Captain of our salvation was given "a name which is above every name," and "more excellent" than that of the angels. It is confidently asserted by inspiration that "there is no other name under heaven among men by which we can be saved," for the reason that there is salvation in no other. The Apostle James refers to it as the "worthy name" by which his brethren were called; and John, the apostle, banished to Patmos, in the significant messages to the seven churches in Asia Minor, sent one to the congregation at Pergamos, in which he presents Jesus as commending it thus: "Thou holdest fast my name and hast not denied my faith."

The divine oracles address mankind in their individual and likewise in their organized capacity. This is pre-eminently true of Christianity. During the personal ministry of Jesus he had learners or pupils, of different degrees of devotion, known by the name of disciples. Some of these were attracted by mere curiosity, and hence were mere hangers-on, actuated largely by a desire to secure the physical benefits he dispensed. When the hour of real test came many of them "went back and walked no more with him." Others, like Joseph of Aramathæa, were willing to be disciples, not openly and boldly, "but secretly, for fear of the Jews."

A higher and more reliable grade of disciples were those who became sincere learners and devoted followers. They approached the standard which the Master fixed when he said: "If ye continue in my Word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." "Bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples." It was this supreme loyalty to the Master that enabled John to speak of himself in his narrative as "that disciple whom Jesus loved."

The term "disciple," as applied to the personal followers of Jesus, was in current use. It was used to represent a pupil of the Greek philosophers. Even in the days of the prophet it was applied with assurance. Isaiah said: "Seal the law among my disciples."

Not only did the Pharisees claim to be the disciples of Moses, but they had in turn disciples of their own. Accordingly, we read (John 9:28) that some of them said somewhat tauntingly to the blind man whom Jesus had restored to sight: "Thou art his [Christ's] disciple; but we are Moses' disciples." Matthew records (22:16) that the Pharisees, bent upon entangling Jesus in his talk, "sent unto him their disciples" to propound their question, "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar or not?"

John, the harbinger of Jesus, had his corps of disciples. Luke says (5:33) that the Scribes and Pharisees submitted to Jesus the question: "Why do the disciples of John fast often and make prayers, and likewise the disciples of the Pharisees; but thine eat and drink?" So faithful was John in the training of his pupils that even the disciples of Jesus looked upon his example as worthy of imitation. Consequently, Luke informs us (11:1): "And it came to pass that as he [Jesus] was praying in a certain place, when he ceased one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples." What is usually known as the Lord's Prayer was the fruit of this reasonable request.

In America we have three terms which intelligent educators use with scrupulous exactness, viz., pupil, student and scholar.

A pupil is one in the primary stages of learning, a beginner, a child under the personal guidance and control of a teacher.

A student is one advanced to higher grades of learning, a worker in the various classes of an academy, normal school, college or university.

A scholar is one who has attained eminence in some science or special department of training. Pupils are numerous; students less so, and scholars comparatively rare.

The disciples of Jesus were his pupils or learners. Some of them were aptly described by Paul in his letter to Timothy (2 Tim. 3:7) as "ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." Their learning was purely receptive rather than self-active. Hence their appeal to Jesus: "Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples."

In this passively receptive state they were not yet qualified to be teachers or apostles. They had not realized and perhaps were not qualified yet to recognize the import of the higher principle enunciated by Paul to the Romans (2:21): "Thou, therefore, which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?" Nor had they reached the standing recommended by the same apostle to Timothy (2 Tim. 2:15): "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not be to ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." True, apostles were sent out by Jesus at times under special commissions; but their mission was rather the doing of specific acts than the proclaiming of fundamental truths. To preach the gospel in its fullness was not their province. They were not competent to do that until after the crucifixion, resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ. The witnessing of his miracles and listening to his instruction upon earth were qaulifications so far as they went; but the quintessence of their message to the world was reserved for the future. Hence Jesus, immediately preceding his ascension, gave them a commission which contemplated the moral and spiritual conquest of the world, the initial work to be done at Jerusalem. For they were directed to tarry in Jerusalem until they were endued with the requisite "power from on high."

Apostleship or teaching, it will be seen, required fuller preparation and higher gifts than simple discipleship. It embraced all that is included in the latter term and much more. Consequently, in filling up the college of apostles to make provision for the loss of Judas the apostate, great care and wisdom had to be exercised. Peter presented the matter in these terms (Acts 1:21,22): "Wherefore of these men which have compained with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from among us, must be ordained to be a witness with us of his resurrection."

Thus far no organization has been effected. Jesus has been laying the foundation for this great work by inculcating those principles which would in all time characterize his kingdom. A constituency was being prepared. The leaven was at work among the masses of the people. Two classes of subjects or agents had been developed—disciples and apostles. They were necessary to afford an intelligent and conscientious citizenship. Without these three years' scholastic training his kingdom could have little hope of permanence.

Keeping Song Books in the Church.

The question of retaining our song books in the church is often a perplexing one. Our late experience has proven effective with us and will bear trying elsewhere. We purchased one hundred song books, of which we set apart 75 for the congregation and retained 25 for sale.

On the front of the book we pasted in large letters, "I belong to the Christian Church and am not to be taken from the church," etc. This poster covered half of the front of the book, the object being to disfigure the book. On the back of the book we stamped in large letters, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, etc., up to 75; we impressed upon the minds of the people that these were only for use in the church, and if any one desired a book for home use there were unmarked ones for sale. If any book had been missed we would have called for the number of the book which had been taken away, but after a three weeks' meeting there were still 75 books. I think the numbering on the back had much to do in accomplishing this result. It will pay trying.

Our Budget.

—A Merry Christmas to all our readers.

—We hope you will be pleased with our cover and its contents this week.

Read the "Christmas Messages" elsewhere from a number of our friends.

—Words of cheer and encouragement continue to pour in upon us from all sections of the country in such abundance that were we to attempt to give them room we should have to crowd out several departments of the paper.

—We wish our friends to know, however, that these words were never more welcome, and especially in view of the fact that they prophesy and pledge active co operation in extending the influence of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST the coming year.

—We are not surprised that our prospectus for the coming year has attracted wide attention and is eliciting many commendations from our readers. We have felt under a moral compulsion to make the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST the equal, at least, of any of the representative journals in other religious bodies in the ability of its writers and the literary quality of its contents. This, of course, involves considerable outlay, but we have gone on the principle that our readers are willing to pay something for it. A letter from one of our leading preachers, just at hand, says: "The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST at the regular price of $1.50 is a marvel of cheapness. It is the equal of any $2 50 journal."

—A. J. Marshall, our city evangelist of St. Louis, is advocating the inauguration of a campaign of concentration. His idea is that our church members should be concentrated near our church centers. He gives the cases of one of our city churches which has a membership of 300, but which, for any special rally, is no more effective than the ordinary church of 100 members, because the 300 are scattered all over the city. Other things being equal, our members certainly should have their residence near the congregation with which they are connected. This is not always practicable, but it is the ideal towards which we should strive.

—Arthur F. Willett, whose death at Dowagiac, Mich., was mentioned in this paper last week, was born in Ionia, Mich., Sept. 3, 1870, the second in a family of four sons, but one of whom, Prof. H L. Willett, remains. Bro. Arthur F. Willett was a graduate of Bethany College, was married to Miss Sylvia Day in October, 1896, spent one year in the University of Chicago, during which time he served as pastor of the West Pullman Church. After a brief rest from overwork in Chicago he became the pastor of the church in Richland Center, Wis., where his health began to fail, with the result stated in our previous notice. The funeral services were conducted by Bro. W. W. Wyrick at the home of Mrs. F. H Essig in Dowagiac, Mich.

—Bulletin No. 3 of the Ecumenical Conference on Foreign Missions, to be held in New York City in April, says that the first of December finds the plans well advanced. The program has been arranged, most of the speakers selected and the order of meetings laid out. Articles for the exhibit are already coming in and there is good prospect that it will be not only of interest but of incalculable value. Sub-committees on special topics, as Comity, Education, Self support, etc., have been hard at work, and the results give assurance of practical value for the actual conduct of work, both at home and abroad. But the committee is greatly in need of funds for the expenses of that great gathering. It is stated that for all purposes not less than $40,000 will be required Money orders and checks may be drawn to the order of Geo. Foster Peadody, Treasurer, 27 Pine St., New York.

—Referring to the editorial valedictory of J. J, Haley, which we print elsewhere in this number, we desire to say that the severance of his connection with the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST is, as he indicates, in order that he may contribute editorially to the Christian Oracle. Bro. Haley has been a contributor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for a number of years in one capacity or another, and severing his connection with it now for the purpose of serving the cause in the same capacity in another paper he carries with him our high appreciation of his intellectual ability, of his genuine loyalty to Jesus Christ and his religion, and of his superior force as a writer. Our relations have been of the most delightful character in the past and will continue to be such, we have no doubt, in the future. Our best wishes go with him, and if at any time in the future he should not be retained in the interest of another paper, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be glad to avail itself once more of his able contributions.

—In connection with the closing article on the Sunday-school lesson by Prof. H. L. Willett, he gives us a letter this week to which we invite the attention of our readers. As he states in his letter, he signified his desire, early last summer, to discontinue the preparation of the Sunday school lessons at the end of the present year, in view of the multiplied calls that were being made upon his time. When the first note of dissatisfaction with his articles were heard by him, later in the season, he immediately wrote us, stating that if his resignation as the writer of the S. S. lessons would pacify matters, he was ready to resign at once, and would cheerfully give place to another. We declined to accept his resignation at that time, for reasons which our readers will readily understand. While we have not been able to assent to every position taken by Bro. Willett, in his able series of articles, and while some of his positions have been on questions concerning which we have made no sufficient investigation to entitle our opinion to any weight, we have never ceased to regard him as essentially sound in the faith of the gospel, and loyal, not only to Christ, but to the Holy Scriptures. It will be a sad day for the Disciples of Christ if they should ever reach the point in denominational narrowness when there is no room among them for such men as Prof. Willett. While Bro. Willett is to continue to write for our columns with more or less frequency along other lines, we felt unwilling to allow this opportunity to pass without this expression of appreciation of the man himself and of his work.

—On the 15th inst. a most interesting and profitable service was held in Louisville, Ky., in the interest of Foreign Missions. The Foreign Society was organized in Louisville, October 21, 1875. The services on the 15th were held in the interest of the Silver Jubilee. There were thirty-five preachers present. These represented three different states. The charter members were all invited to be present; some could not attend. Addresses were made by H. S. Earl, John S Shouse, F. M. Rains, I. J. Spencer, W. S. Giltner, John W. McGarvey, E. L. Powell, George Darsie, C. W. Dick, C. L. Loos, W. S. Dickinson, H. T. Cree, C. A Thomas and John E. Pounds. The ladies of the First Church provided for the entertainment of the guests. This meeting will do much good and will be long remembered by those who were present.

—On our last cover page this week will be found a full-page advertisement of the Paris Medicine Co. We desire our readers to know that the men connected with this company are known to the editor of this paper as Christian gentlemen, and many of them are members of the Christian Church. Their great remedy, the Laxative Bromo-quinine has a world wide reputation. We can bear personal testimony to the virtue of this remedy as well as to the character of the men at the head of the company.

—We print elsewhere this week an appeal from Bros. McGavran and Wharton for the famine stricken people of India. Read what they say and if your heart feels moved to respond send your offering either to the treasurer of the C W. B. M. at Indianapolis, or of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society at Cincinnati. The case is urgent and prompt action should be taken.

—A copy of Dr H. L. Willett's "Prophets of Israel" has just been received from the press of the Revell Publishing Company. This book completes the third series of the handbooks prepared for the Bethany C. E Reading Courses, the other two having already been noticed in this department in previous numbers. This book by Dr. Willett takes us into one of the richest fields of study in the Old Testament and familiarizes us with men whom God used in the government and discipline of Israel. Dr. Willett has made special study of the prophets and their times and has given us a book of undoubted merit. The chronological table at the close and the analysis of each prophetic book treated following each chapter will be found both useful and convenient. These books, while prepared for the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses, are by no means limited to them in interest and value, but should be in the hands of our people generally, both old and young. The books may be had singly or in sets, and all order should be sent to J. Z Tyler, 793 Republic St., Cleveland, O. The books may be had at one dollar per set, or thirty-five cents per single copy.

—The Foreign Society is having a real Silver Jubilee experience. It has just received another gift of $500. These good reports are coming thick and fast just now. We hope we will be able next week to make an even better report.

—The sad message of the death of W. H. Hayden, elsewhere in this paper, at Collinwood, Ohio, comes to us just as we go to press, and we hasten to express sympathy to the sorrowing wife and children.

—It is a very easy matter to understimate the ability of the average reader, or of the mass of readers of our religious journals. They are where they are, religiously, as a rule, because they have dared to think for themselves, and they are not prepared to abdicate in favor of some one else who shall do their religious thinking for them. One of these plain readers, writing from the state of Texas, says: "I am one of your humblest readers, but I can say with assurance that there has been no question on which you have written in which I have not fully understood you. You have my heartiest support." He then gives us some practical suggestions concerning the paper, for which he has our thanks. This man is not a preacher or an educated man, and yet he has no difficulty in understanding our position, as some others have, who make more pretensions. We never feel that we have anything to say that is too difficult for our readers to understand if we understand it clearly ourselves, and we have found, through a long experience, that an editor can depend, in the long run, on the saving commonsense and shrewd discernment of his readers to distinguish between chaff and wheat, or between the false and the true.

—A correspondent writes asking, "How can the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, at $1 50 per year, hope to compete with the ————, which can be had for $1.00 per year?" Just as a $1.50 hat is able to compete with a $1.00 hat. It costs more to make a $1.50 hat than it does to produce a $1.00 hat, but there are some people willing to pay the difference and get a better hat. In that way it is possible for the producer of the higher priced hat to make a livelihood. If the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is not superior either in quantity or in its literary quality and the ability of its writers to the $1 00 papers, the latter will doubtless receive all the patronage in time. We put the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on its merits and rest it there.

—A number of Sunday-schools which have been trying the Blakslee System are now giving it up and going back to the splendid series of International Lessons for the year 1900. It is not denied that the series of lessons mentioned above have merit, and it may be in some respects superior merit to the International, but, taken as a whole, the International series has advantages which are not compensated for in any other system. We believe it is to be constantly improved until it shall possess all the merits of any other system, with the advantages which it already possesses. Bishop Vincent was right when he said, several years ago, "The International Series of Sunday-school Lessons has come to this planet to stay."

—We learn through a card from Bro. J. W. Monser, Columbia, Mo., that Bro. W. T. Moore, dean of the Bible College, met with an accident on Sunday night, the 10th inst., while going home from church. The small bone of the leg above the ancle was broken, and he will probably be on his back for a month or more. We sympathize with our brother in this misfortune and trust he may soon be able to resume his work.

—David J. Peters, of Holden, Mo., says: "An omission of one line in 'A Word from Holden, Mo.,' in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Nov. 30, 1899, page 1523, makes a very bad reading. It should read, lines 10-12, 'the more than usual interest and work in the University Endeavor class, and the greatly improved physical condition of the minister.'"

—The First Christian Church, Birmingham, Ala., of which O. P. Spiegel is minister, has bought one of the most centrally located lots in that growing city and erected thereon a modern tabernacle for temporary use. They hope soon to build a stone or pressed-brick structure for permanent use. It is situated on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Twenty-first Street.

—The November number of the American Home Missionary, containing a full report of the Jubilee Convention and of the work done under the auspices of the American Christian Missionary Society for the past year is out and is an unusually large magazine. Another feature of it, which while not new is greatly enlarged, is cuts of evangelists who have done work under the direction of the board during the year, and also of many of the friends of Home Missions. We do not see, therefore, how this number of this magazine can fail to be of deep interest to every Disciple of Christ. If you have not yet received a copy, send at once to B. L. or C. C. Smith, Cincinnati, O., and procure one by return mail.

—The Missionary Intelligencer for December is a good number. The editorial on the 20th century funds should be read by all our people; it contains food for reflection.

"What's in a Name?"

Everything when you come to medicines. A sarsaparilla by any other name can never equal Hood's, because of the peculiar combination, proportion and process by which Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses merit peculiar to itself, and by which it cures when all other medicines fail. Cures scrofula, salt rheum, dyspepsia, catarrh, rheumatism, loss of appetite and that tired feeling.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Never Disappoints

Hood's Pills cure liver ills: the non-irritating and only cathartic to take with Hood's Sarsaparilla.

—Rev. John Watson's life of Christ, beginning in the December number of McClure's magazine, is illustrated by pictures made in Palestine by Corwin Knapp Luison, and it is needless to add that they are the finest that skill and expense can produce. We know of no articles promised in magazine literature for 1900 that promises more interest and profit to the reading portion of the religious world than this life of Christ in McClure's magazine, the prologue of which appears in the December number. This serial of articles will certainly have, in addition, a special interest for preachers, teachers and all Bible students. The series, we understand, will run throughout the year 1900, and each to be accompanied with beautifully colored illustrations. The January number, we are told, is to contain eight of these illustrations. This life of Christ will be in time with the Sunday-school lessons for the coming year.

—Is it any wonder that the world looks askance upon religion when some of its leading churches publish such announcements as is set forth in the following paragraph from W. E. Curtis, in the Chicago Record:

This is the era of big things—world-beaters—and there is a great variety of them. The latest novelty in the world-beating line is a grand progressive euchre party which is advertised to take place at the Grand Central Palace in this city Jan. 10, 1900, for the benefit of the Catholic Church of St. Philip. The idea is said to have originated with a young lady of the parish and Father Daniel Burke, the pastor, is pushing it with energy. There are to be 600 tables and 2,400 players, divided into 100 groups of six tables each, with 200 ordinary prizes for the best gentleman and lady player of each group and one grand prize for the couple making the best score. It costs $2 to enter, which includes refreshments to be served after the game and the privilege of dancing when the floor is cleared.

—Four attitudes are conceivable, viz., indifference, indiscriminate hostility, indiscriminate acceptance of everything suggested by higher critics and a hearty recognition of the legitimacy of higher criticism as an instrument for ascertaining the truth concerning the Bible, with the reserved right of accepting or rejecting its conclusions, according as they may commend themselves to our judgment, after giving them an honest and fearless examination.—J. H. Garrison.

Yes, these four attitudes are conceivable; but it is well that the writer did not say only four; for there is another, which is not only conceivable, but indispensable to a right course. That is, uncompromising hostility to all the conclusions which, after giving them an honest and fearless examination, you find false, and calculated to undermine the faith of the disciples. It is for a failure to stand in this last attitude that J. H. Garrison has been criticised.—J. W. McGarvey, in the Christian Standard.

This criticism is neither "Biblical" nor reasonable, we regret to say. After wrestling for weeks with the statement which he quotes from the editor of this paper, Bro. McGarvey imagines he has conceived of a fifth attitude toward higher criticism, namely, hostility to the conclusions found to be false! But what is meant by the fourth attitude, with its "reserved right" of "rejecting" whatever is found to be false? Isn't "rejection" a stronger word even than "hostility?" This is mere trifling. It isn't criticism, and not near so many people are fooled by it as may be imagined.

—The following interesting item of news is from the 15th annual report of the C. W. B. M., of Virginia:

Virginia raised last year, through the C. W. B. M., over $13,000, but the larger part of this was in special gifts for the endowment of the Bible Chair at the University of Virginia, and at the Cincinnati convention it was decided that the work for the coming year should be the completion of this endowment, and so our workers from Maine to Florida, and from California to Virginia, shall, with one accord, give themselves to this effort.

—Number one of Vol. 5 of the Add-Ran Collegian is a creditable magazine; it contains some well-written articles as well as college news. Its praise of Chancellor Buxton is exceptionally expressive.

—"This week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has come, and I have just read something of what we are to have for 1900. If carefully studied it will be almost equal to a year in a university. I shall read it from the pulpit Sunday.

E. W. BRICKERT.

Sullivan, Ill.

That is encouraging. This brother knows a good thing when he sees it, and he knows a program like that costs something, and that such an outlay made for the benefit of the readers of a paper should meet with a cordial response from them in the way of active co-operation.

—Speaking of Sunday-school lessons, the following is the very high testimonial as to the superior value of the Lesson Commentary and other Sunday-school helps issued from this office:

Since we are to use the International Lessons I am glad that we have such valuable helps as you offer. They are by far the best I have seen. Between yours and those of a worthy competitor, a comparison becomes a contrast. There is as much difference between the two as there is between art and awkwardness. Your comments mean something, the practical lessons are excellent. There is nothing put in to "fill up." The needs of scholars are met. The very elect must be satisfied with the doctrinal soundness of these helps. In spite of all the anxiety over the Sunday-school department of the EVANGELIST, our children are safe from heresy for the year of grace 1900. Our order will be forwarded in a few days.

E. B. BARNES.

—The Youth's Companion Calendar for 1900, received at this office last week, would ornament the family room of any home. In design and elegance it seems to surpass any of the beautiful calendars in which the Youth's Companion Company, Boston, Mass., seems to take so much pride and for which they are justly noted. If you want an ornament for your home or a gift for a friend it would be difficult to find one more satisfactory or that would be better appreciated.

An Insidious Attack.

The following circular has been forwarded to us by a number of persons who have received a copy of it. If the circular is a genuinely honest document, it will help it to accomplish its mission to bring it out into daylight. We wish our readers to have the benefit of every good thing there is going, and so we print this circular without charge to the firm that sends it out:

CINCINNATI, O., November 21, 1899.

There is a growing dread among all who cherish the best interests of the Sunday-school that its literature may be tainted with that modern skepticism which has not hesitated in pride of opinion to lay unholy hands upon the Bible and discredit its records.

At such a time it is only right that all who have to do with the preparation of our Sunday-school literature should openly declare themselves.

As for us and our house we desire to go on record. The chief glory of the Standard publications is the purity of its teaching. Pleading as we do, publicly and privately, for an absolute surrender of all matters of opinion to the infallible authority of the Scriptures, we tremble at the thought of placing any occasion for stumbling in the way of the little ones who depend in any measure on us for guidance. God helping us, we intend that the Word of God, which is the only light for our path, shall shine undimmed for the feet of all who look to us for instruction.

We beg you as brethren and fellowworkers to consider these things, and to unite with us in presenting a front so solid against all false teaching that others shall be deterred from trifling with these holy interests.

J. A. LORD,
J. W. MCGARVEY,
PHILIP Y. PENDLETON,
MATTIE M. BOTELER.

Accompanying the above appeal to the Sunday-schools is another circular from the Standard Pub. Co., signed by that company "per Russell Errett, Treas.," which claims for the Standard series, among other exclusive merits, "that it abjures, in root and branch, the pernicious skepticism that masquerades in the clothing of scholarship, undermining the authority of the Scriptures by discarding their records."

What we have to say concerning these circulars shall be very plain and direct.

1. They are intended to discredit and undermine the sale of the Christian Pub. Co.'s series of Sunday-school supplies, in the interest of those of the Standard Pub. Co.

2. Neither of the persons signing these circulars know anything against the series of Sunday-school supplies that they thus seek to undermine. On the contrary they know, if they have examined them, that they are as sound and even as conservative as those of the Standard Pub. Co. Not a note of criticism against them on this score has ever been heard.

3. What, then, is the motive that prompts these persons to circularize the schools in the above manner, seeking to break down confidence in a rival series? Does anybody believe it to be pure, disinterested zeal for the truth? Are we to judge of "the purity of teaching" of the Standard supplies by the "purity" of motive which prompts this business method?

We have only to add that the sending out of such circulars shows an egregious underestimate of the intelligence of the people. The man who is not shrewd enough to see through so thin a disguise would need to have a guardian. Meanwhile, the Christian Pub. Co 's Sunday-school supplies continue to go into about two thirds of the schools of the brotherhood, and they go on their own merits.

The enlarged chapel in Springfield, Mass., was dedicated Dec. 10, with gratitude and joy. Ample funds were raised in cash and pledges to cover a small debt. The outlay was about $1,200. We now have, on leased land, a comfortable and attractive house of worship, which will seat 160 persons. The advance step and success at dedication promise to extend our influence in the community. J. H Mohorter and R. A. Nichols were our speakers. We desire to thank all who aided us. We give glory to God. E. C. DAVIS, Pastor.

PERSONAL MENTION.

S. E. Fisher has accepted a call to succeed W. W. Sniff, Gibson City, Ill.

J. B. Briney is engaged for a meeting in Reserve, Kan., to begin Jan. 1st.

The church in Rantoul, Ill., recently raised $40 for Illinois missions.

C. G. Kindred, of Abingdon, Ill., goes to Englewood, Ill.

A. C. Roach, of Ipava, Ill., has accepted the assistant pastorate at Jacksonville, Ill.

S. F. Field writes that he has been instrumental in saving the church building in Konts, Ind., to the church in that place.

F. M. Rains aims to start about July 1st on his missionary tour of Japan and China, and will be absent four or five months.

R. G Frank is said to be giving good satisfaction as a preacher for the church in Fulton, Mo.

Brother Romig has held a most successful meeting in Keokuk, Ia. There were 127 additions.

W. T. Adams requests any church in Eastern, Kan., wanting a protracted meeting soon to address him at Chanute, Kan., at once.

Pres. B. A. Jenkins, of Indianapolis, who has been quite ill of late, reports himself convalescing nicely

Prof. Hackleman, of Indianapolis, assisted L. H. Graham in a three weeks' meeting at Worthington, Ind.

T. P. Reid, of Selma, Cal., volunteers his assistance in booming the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1900.

F C. Ford has accepted a call from the South and North Lubec (Nova Scotia) churches and will begin labor with them at once.

A. L. Ferguson has been retained by the church in Augusta, Ill., for the second year. The outlook for the second year is promising.

C. E. Smootz, of Manor, Tex., is closing his work there and is ready to engage for protracted meetings or a pastorate. Address him for terms.

O. P. Spiegel, of Birmingham, Ala., has been called for his seventh year in that city. This is an excellent compliment to his work there.

W. H. Hook, of Mexico, Mo., has promised to get in some good work for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST during the present winter. Can you do us a like favor?

J. W. Bratcher, of Cardiff, Ark., will preach at Mena, Ark., the coming year. The brethren at this point are preparing to build a parsonage.

The Christian Church in Shelbyville, Ind., has published a neat souvenir directory, opening with a full-page half-tone picture of the pastor, E. Finley Mahan.

A. E. Cory, pastor of the church in Oskaloosa, Iowa, has had a great meeting there, 115 additions, and is highly esteemed by the the church as an able preacher of the Word.

W. H. Waggoner is succeeding admirably with his missionary institutes. From Merson, Mich., he says: "House full first night; great interest." He will be in Fremont Dec. 18-24.

I. H. Fuller writes that the church in Wapello, Iowa, greatly regrets the loss of Dr. Wm. M. Semones and his wife by removal to Atlanta, Ga The church in Wapello is in a prosperous state.

J. Wintgen, pastor of the church in Norcatur, Kan., writes that the church there expect to pay off the balance of its debt by January. Their house of worship has recently been carpeted.

C. W. Van Dolah, of Shawnee, O. T., informs us that they lost their babe, to them so precious, on the 13th inst. God transplanted it. We extend to Bro. and Sister Van Dolah our sympathy.

W. F. Turner, pastor of the church in Joplin, Mo., says: "Every saloon in Joplin has been closed, front and back, top and bottom, for five successive Sundays. Sixty-six of our gamblers are now in the toils of our state officers."

After four years' service and against the unanimous request of the church in Blandinsville, Ill., A R Adams has closed his work. The church has prospered under his preaching and the parting is not without deep regret by both pastor and church.

The First Church at Little Rock, Ark., is pushing a vigorous campaign. The pastor, J. N. Jessup, recently closed a good meeting. Twenty five have been added to the church in the past two months. The church has two flourishing missions in the city.

M. E. Harlan's name now appears as the editor of the Christian Courier, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and from its pages it is evident that a broad and active campaign is being planned for the church in that part of Greater New York.

D. A. Wickizer is much pleased with his new field at Beatrice, Neb. Good audiences, a class of 30 in the Ann Arbor Bible Course and $500 recently raised to pay off old debts. Nebraska he thinks a great field. There have been 30 added since he went there.

E. C. Browning is the hard working evangelist of Arkansas His labors are greatly blessed. The state mission work is more prosperous than ever before. Several new railroads in the state will open up a larger territory for missionary effort.

R Miller, of Williamsport, Pa., who recently held a successful meeting in Scranton, can be secured for either evangelistic or pastoral work. The work in Scranton, R. W. Clymer, pastor, is reported in a prosperous state.

We have elsewhere mentioned the resignation of A. R. Adams, at Blandiasville, Ill. Later word informs us that Astoria, Ill., has extended him a call. He is announced, however, to preach in Burling on, Iowa, Dec. 24th, and in Tarkio, Mo., Dec. 31st.

W. A. Streator and A. R. Wallace, of Cardiff, Ark., recently visited Waldron, where our brethren have a comfortable house. Waldron expects a railroad soon and it is said that there is still room for homeseekers in that country.

W. H Willyard closed his work as pastor of the Christian Church of Murphysboro, Ill., Nov. 27, and the officers of the church say that he has been a faithful preacher and an untiring worker in the Master's cause, and that he is worthy of the confidence of the brotherhood and that his work will long be felt in Murphysboro.

Brother Waggoner's Thanksgiving Day sermon, preached in Princeton, Ill , was published at length in the Bureau County Republican. It was devoted largely to the wonderful progress of the country in science and material things, but properly balanced with due notice of accompanying dangers and need for heeding the better things of this life.

Bruce Brown is to leave Chicago, Ill., for Denver, Col., where a warm reception is said to be awaiting him. Chicago will miss Bruce Brown. The outlook in Denver is said to be flattering.

Robt. L. Erwin, of New Orleans, La., would like persons who have actually been cured of rheumatism to tell him the remedy that cured them; he has a critical case on hand. Address Lock Box 998.

A. M. Chamberlain, of Alliance, O., having been assisted in a recent meeting by H. F. MacLane, of Toledo, O., speaks of him as a most able and companionable colaborer in the Master's work.

J. M. Reid, M. D., says: "At Kimball, Kan., we have a church building, but not a member to worship here. Why is it thus? Good country, good people, prosperous times. Let us have an evangelist.

Charles Reign Scoville says that he has received 84 calls for protracted meetings within a short space of time. This he interprete to be an indication of an onward and upward movement in the churches.

W. J. Hudspeth, of Little Rock, Ark., is doing faithful work as chaplain of the Arkansas Penitentiary. His heart is in the work. The convicts love him, and he has led many of them to desire a better life.

W. A. Streator, of Cardiff, Ark., writes encouragingly of the work there and thereabouts. Their pulpit is filled by preaching brethren of the colony. E. C. Browning, corresponding secretary for Arkansas, recently supplied them with song books.

The church at Jacksonville, Ill., of which Geo L Snively is pastor, has called an assistant pastor, to begin his work there Jan. 1st. The Jacksonville congregation is one of our strongest churches and we are glad to know that the present efficient pastor is to be reinforced in his pastoral work.

B. A. Abbott, pastor of the Harlem Avenue Church, Baltimore, Md., recently attracted wide attention by a sermon, in which he claimed that we need a new Protestantism, in which there should be no sectarianism, a brotherhood of man, and the man valued above the dollar, etc. The sermon was printed in the Baltimore American, accompanied with his picture.

Eight new missionaries have been appointed for the Foreign Society. George W. Brown and wife, of Princeton, Mo., go to India. Hermon P. Williams and wife and C. S. Weaver and wife go to the Philippines. Abram E. Cory and wife go to the Hawaiian Islands These workers will not sail before September. Those who go to the Philippines will not leave before November.

A friend who recently visited Water Valley, Miss., on business, attended J. A. Stevens' tent meeting and pronounces it a marvel. The large tent was crowded, from 900 to 1 000 people, and in breathless silence during the sermon Of the preacher he says that "he [Stevens] is strong all over, a knock-down logican," and an orator. He baptized 16 men and nine women the day and night of this friend's visit.

L L. Carpenter dedicated the new church building in Remington, Ind., Dec. 10th. It is a modern structure throughout, of brick, well built, well arranged, well furnished and well located. The plant is worth $8,000 Within forty minutes, at the dedication, over $3 400 was raised in cash and pledges. J. D. Carson, their pastor, has been with them seven years and is held in esteem by the church and its friends.

We were made happy in this office on last Friday by a very pleasant visit from A. M. Harvuot, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Bro. H. was on his way to Panora, Iowa, to dedicate a new church building. Bro. Harvuot is looking fine and seems to have suffered no loss of energy, patience or brotherly kindness by wear and tear of the preparatory work of the Jubilee Convention, to which he was more especially subjected.

J. V. Coombs, writing of his Kansas City meeting, says: "Our Kansas City meeting was one of the most pleasant that I have held. I renewed my acquaintance with Bro. Haley, whom I heard preach when I was a schoolteacher; with W. F. Richardson, a classmate in Eureka College; with G. F. Shields, with whom I had worked in Illinois. About 30 of our preachers visited us during the meeting. From Kansas City I went to Murphysboro for a few days. Thirty accessions there in six nights. In three months there have been about 300 accessions where I have been preaching. Dec. 31st I will begin at Pittsfield, Ill. I have no engagement for February. I will make all my arrangements until May within a few days. Address me, 107 Butler Avenue, Indianapolis, Ind."

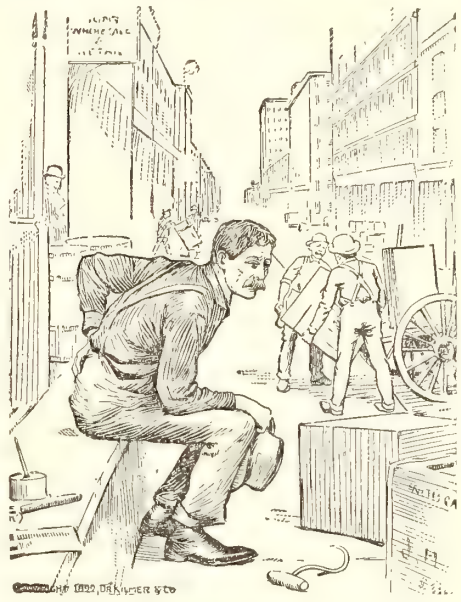
DON'T NEGLECT YOUR KIDNEYS.

Weak Kidneys Caused by Over-work, by Lifting or a Strain.

It used to be considered that only urinary troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

Now by this is not meant that you should overlook all the other organs and merely look after the kidneys.

Your other organs may need attention—but but your kidneys most, because they do most.



If you are sick, do not neglect your kidneys, because as soon as they are well, they will help all the other organs to health.

The mild and immediate effect of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. Swamy-Root will set your whole system right, and the best proof of this is a trial.

You may have a sample bottle of this famous kidney remedy sent free by mail, postpaid, by which you may test its virtues for such disorders as kidney, bladder and uric acid diseases, and urinary troubles, obliged to pass water frequently night and day, smarting or irritation in passing, brick dust or sediment in the urine, constant headache, backache, lame back, dizziness, sleeplessness, indigestion, nervousness, skin trouble, Bright's disease, neuralgia, rheumatism, bloating, irritability, worn-out feeling, lack of ambition, loss of flesh, sallow comlpexion.

If your water, when allowed to remain undisturbed in a glass or bottle for twenty four hours, forms a sediment or settling or has a cloudy appearance, it is evidence that your kidneys and bladder need immediate attention.

Swamp-Root is the great discovery of the eminent kidney specialist, Dr. Kilmer, and is used in the leading hospitals; recommended by skilful physicians in their private practice; and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recogoize in it the greatest and most successful remedy for kidney and bladder troubles that science has ever been able to compound.

If you have the slightest symptoms of kidney or bladder trouble, or if there is a trace of it in your family history, send at once to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., who will gladly send you, by mail immediately, without cost to you, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book containing many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from sufferers cured. Be sure to say that you read this article in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at drug stores. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root.

The church in Warrensburg, Mo , has published a church directory for the convenience of its members containing, in addition, a campaign outline for 1900 and much general but useful information. The church has a large enrollmest and is now in the hands of an energetic pastor, H. A. Denton.

C. A Holgren, who out of his own desire is doing evangelistic work among the Scandinavians in St. Paul, Minneapolis, and other parts of Minnesota, reports that he has received the following contributions to assist in the work: In St, Paul, W M. Hay, $10; a friend, $5; another, $2 In Minneapolis, D. O. Thomas, $10; Mr. Siblett, $5; Mr Hay, $5; S B. Matuson, $5; F. E. Herthum, $1; Dr. Hager, $1; a collection, $5 In Plainview, Mr and Mrs. Clough, $25; Mrs. Watkins, $25; C. F. Greenwood, $5; L. M Holmes, $2; P. M Givens, Olivia, $2 50; E. G Chilton, Howard Lake, $5; Elder Miller and Gardner Miller, Austin, each, $1 In Iowa, from Cedar Rapids, I. H. Shaver, $5; P. C. Frick, $2; a friend, $5; W. H. Frick, 2; B. H Witwer, $2. Friends in Miriam, $2. From Mason City, A J. Parker, W H Pedan, H. I. Prussia and Dr. Pool, Sunday school class, each, $1; G F Miller, 25 cts ; W. J. Strickland, 50 cts.; Elder Martin, $2. From Nora Springs, H. F. Schnedler J. E. Curfey, each, $1. From Marble Rock, W. C. Smith, $1; a friend, 25 cts From Hampton, Bro Gladstone, 50 cts., and R. W. Brisdale, $1 As to the worhtines and reliability of Bro. Holgren we append the following reliable testimonial:

DEAR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—I know Bro. Holgren and his work. His work has the endorsement of our state convention, but we have not the money to give it our financial support He is developing the Scandinavian work in the towns, cities and state by his own resources, and at great sacrifice. He is dependent on free will offerings. He has prosecuted the work with a devotion that deserves support. Let me assure any who will share his sacrifice that it is money given to the Lord.

Christmas Messages

We are glad to give place to the following Christmas messages which have been sent to the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and to thank our friends for the same. These messages will doubtless give added radiance to thousands of the happy firesides of our readers during this Christmastide.

"The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us."

"Light on thy hills, Jerusalem!
The Savior now is born!
And bright on Bethlehem's joyous plain Breaks the first Christmas morn."

METTIE CRANE NEWTON.

New York City.

The angel of the Lord brought "good tidings of great joy." The old world was so sad that suicide was looked upon as a priceless boon. Every man was a wolf to his neighbor. Half the population were slaves. Children were exposed. Women were degraded and divorced without reason and without reluctance. Vice and crime abounded.

"On that hard pagan world, disgust
And secret loathing fell;
Deep weariness and sated lust
Made human life a hell."

The non-Christian world of to-day has almost no joy in it. Childhood and womanhood are not bright and full of blessing. The sources of gladness are closed against them. With most people there is a constant and desperate struggle to get the bare necessaries of life. The rich are little happier than the poorest. Their own souls are depraved. They have no peace and no hope of better things. Christ brought joy to the race. He bore our sins and carried our sorrows. He gives peace and joy to those who receive him and do his will. In the Christmas season we can sing the old words with new meaning, "Joy to the world, the Lord is come." A. MCLEAN.

Cincinnati, O.

THE ANGELS' SONG.

"Praise thou the Lord," the angels cry,
The song of peace and love
Comes floating downward thro' the sky
From unseen courts above"

RUBY HUSTON.

Hustonville, Ky.

The great, glad fact is the Incarnation. Millions of shadowed faces brighten as they exclaim, "Immanuel"—"God with us!" With us in the person of his Son, our Redeemer, cradled at Bethlehem; with us in the person of his Spirit, our Comforter, cradled in our hearts. But now if we have let God in, we should through generous hands and fragrant lips let God out! Into the desert world from every soul that continues the Incarnation let streams of blessings flow.

FRANK G. TYRRELL.

Chicago, Ill.

In that beautiful story of Thomas Nelson Page—"Santa Claus' Partner"—we have the true Christmas spirit. Scrooge and his ilk can know nothing of the joys of Christmas. Let us open our hearts and take into them all the sweetness and sympathy and liberality which are involved in the reception of Christ. Let love rule and reign. Let us learn how blessed a thing it is to look out upon the world for one day at least through the eyes of a child rather than through the eyes sharpened by watching for the "main chance" or dulled by distrust or saddened by our personal heartaches and disappointments. E. L. POWELL.

Louisville, Ky.

Christmas, 1799! Christmas, 1899! Christmas, 1999! In the one hundred years just passed how great has been the progress in the religious world! A million people are pleading for the union of all Christians. A mighty host are the Sunday-school scholars and Christian Endeavorers. God grant that the Disciples of this age may build upon a foundation so broad and wide and deep, a Christian love so all-absorbing, that when Christmas, 1999, shall be written, the union of all God's people shall be a joyful fact, and "there shall be one fold and one shepherd."

MRS. F. M. LOWE.

Kansas City, Mo.

All hail to the Babe in the manger who glorified babyhood!

All hail to the Lad in the temple who dignified youth!

All hail to the Son at the Jordan who magnified obedience!

All hail to the divine Healer of all diseases!

All hail to the Savior who saves from all sins!

All hail to the Sufferer who sanctified all suffering on the cross!

All hail to the risen Lord who opened the gates of the tomb!

All hail to the Only One who can make atonement for all!

All hail to the Sympathetic and All-powerful Intercessor who is at the right hand of God interceding for his people!

All hail to the God-man, Jesus Christ, in whose name we send this Christian greeting!

C. P. WILLIAMSON.

Atlanta, Ga.

At this glad season of the year, when the whole civilized world is commemorating the advent of the Son of God, let me add my congratulations to those of the many friends of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST—to you for the pure, unselfish and helpful spirit of this leader among our papers. While we are all in the spirit of gladness, amiability and generousness, let us all bear in mind that our truest and surest happiness lies in the happiness of those around us. May the whole CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST family be pre eminent in the work of the Lord, while constantly striving to closely imitate the Christ-life. T. H. BLENUS.

Jacksonville, Fla.

Standing amid the waning activities of the old, with a deep feeling and firm faith that the new century will be a nobler one; that we and all God's people will view all religious questions and all religious truth from a higher altitude, thus bringing us nearer to God and into right relation to the larger and wider humanity; that the opening century will bring to the hearts of our own people a profounder consciousness of the part they are to play in the world's conversion; that our wise men and trusted leaders will pay less attention to the mere point in the line that our great fathers, as reformers, by the Word and Sptrit, taught us to follow in order to reach and realize "remission of sins," and will pay more attention to the great necessity of seeing Christ, the crucified, with such spiritual clearness that we cry out, "My Lord and my God!" and that we have good reason to be thankful that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, ever going backward to Christ in spirit and faith, will continue to go forward, "looking unto Jesus," in the execution of his will and the doing of his work in the world—I greet your great family at this glad Christmas season. J. M. RUDY.

Cedar Rapids, Ia., Dec. 12, 1899.

"Peace on earth and good will to men" can only be as the truth and grace of Christ shall regenerate the race. God patiently waits and ceaselessly labors for this grand consummation; and his people should be coworkers with him in overthrowing iniqnity of every kind and in establishing the reign of righteousness in the earth. W. J. RUSSELL.

Rushville, Ind.

The Incarnation is the translation of God into human life. The birth of Christ marks, not only the opening of a new era in human history and the dawn of a fuller revelation of God, but the beginning of a new stage in the unfolding life of the race. There is a sense in which the Incarnation is continuous. There is no better definition of a genuine Christian to-day than to say that he is Christ continued. And this not because he outwardly copies the life Christ lived in Palestine, but because Christ is found within him as the inspiration and molding power of his own life. It will be a great gain in many ways when we come to a practical recognition of the fact that the reproduction of Christ in us is the ultimate purpose of God concerning us. J. Z. TYLER.

Cleveland, O.

We may in part repel the tide that ever sets toward evil at such a season by observing Christmas ourselves in the spirit of devout remembrance of the most precious gift of God's love. No floral offerings nor echoing anthems nor pealing chimes can replace the soul's true devotion.

"The heart must ring thy Christmas bells,
Thy inward altars raise;
Its faith and hope thy canticles,
And its obedience praise."

CLINTON LOCKHART.

Canton, Mo.

Luke 2:10: "Fear not." It is not ill news, but good news; a greater unfolding of God's glory; a large faith; the dawning of a universal peace on earth and good will among men.

S. D. DUTCHER.

Mexico, Mo.

Bring grateful thoughts for the Christmas morn,
With the tender greens to twine;
Love hath its crowning victory won
With the birth of the One divine.
O listen, ye weary hearted and sad,
O listen awhile by the way,
For the song of the angels, sweet and glad,
Which heralds the Christmas day!

LISA A. FLETCHER.

Manchester, N. H.

Say to the great CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST family that the best way to observe Christmas is to begin to obey Christ more strictly and to serve him more faithfully. In the language of little Tim, "God bless us every one" this glad Christmas day! J. H. HARDIN.

Eureka, Ill.

The most encouraging sign of the times is the widespread influence of Christ. This does not always result in giving us his high ideal, either in doctrine or life, but it cannot be doubted that the world is slowly but surely approximating his great standard of living. It is easy for pessimists to find fault with this statement, but it is their habit to find fault. This is their occupation. It is well that we have their grumbles. These form a sort of background to the Christmas picture, across which is written, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good will toward men!"

W. T. MOORE.

Columbia, Mo.

May peace, of which the angels sang;
Good will with which the heavens rang
On that glad Christmas morning,
When Christ was born in Bethlehem,
Be like a jeweled diadem,
Our hearts and lives adorning.
My faith and joy, truth, zeal and love,
With gratitude to Him above,
Who every good decrees us;
Each talent, thought, each hope and prayer,
Be bought for frank ncense and myrrh,
A Christmas gift to Jesus.

LAURENE HIGHFIELD.

Quincy, Ky.

The manger-throne grows mightier with each passing year, and its widening sway foretells the coming time when peace and good will shall enswathe the earth, and when the nations shall know no light save that which shines from the Star of Bethlehem. May this Christmastide be no hindrance to that approaching day. May it for all of us be the sweetest festival of spiritual joy we have ever known.

GEORGE DARSIE.

Frankfort, Ky.

Christianity is that holy thing whose foundation is a gift and whose life is maintained by giving. It includes forgiveness, love, liberality and salvation. It is these or it is nothing. If one day in the year emphasizes that truth more than another, that day is Christmas, the anniversary of God's great gift to us. I greatly rejoice in the splendid work the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has done in giving, clearer conceptions to these high truths.

PETER AINSLIE.

Baltimore, Mo.

The true joy of the Christmas season is inspired, not alone by the customary courtesies and remembrances of the day, but by the consciousness that the Son of God, who came once to earth as a little child, is evermore coming into the world to pervade by his divine presence the atmosphere of human activity in the family, the church and society. The Incarnation is a perpetual and ever-increasing fact.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The University of Chicago.

Christmas greetings to the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST and its large family. May heaven's richest, choicest and best blessings be with the entire family at this glad Christmas time. During the year 1900 may all of us grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. May we all become more spiritual and have more of the Christ-mind May the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST family greatly increase and may we all lay our hand in the loving hand of our Elder Brother and follow him wherever he may lead; whether down in the valley or on the mountain steep may we all follow, follow on.

L. L. CARPENTER.

A Christmas Message! What shall it be? What should it be but a message of cheer and hope? Christmas means, not only the fulfillment of prophecy, but the fulfillment of human expectation. It means the coming of redeeming influences into the whole life of humanity—it means the new creation of man and of society. Well might the coming of Christ be designated the sunrise of history. Meet it is for each one to ask, What does the advent mean to me? Has Christ come into my life? Has he fulfilled my inmost hopes? Is his Spirit becoming incarnated in my character, so that my advent is in some true sense his advent?

JAMES M. CAMPBELL.

Lombard, Ill.

I send you and your large constituency hearty Christmas greetings. May the good Father above so direct his providence and guide the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST that both its editor and readers may be abundantly blessed during the last year of the closing century.

J. B. BRINEY.

Paris, Mo.

Compliments of the season to you and the editorial staff. Congratulations on the happy issue of recent complications and best wishes for the future of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, which stands for freedom, truth and righteousness and by far the best paper ever published in our brotherhood. May great prosperity attend both paper and editors.

T. P. HALEY.

Kansas City, Mo.

Out of the great loving heart of God came the first glad Christmastide, so pure and gentle, so strong and abundant, that it has borne a part of humanity forward out of sin into grace, out of sadness into singing, out of midnight into sunlight and out of trouble into triumph. Its depth and sweep and swiftness, its glory and beauty increase as it flows, and my prayer is that many millions more may learn of its blessedness—its love and truth, wisdom and forgiving power—during the coming year.

I. J. SPENCER.

Lexington, Ky.

A happy Christian greeting to the great CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST family. Rejoice and be glad in the Lord, for his love is great and his tender mercies are over us all. I have been fed and strengthened by the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST since it was the little four-page "Gospel Echo," and it never set a better table than now, nor ministered more love, comfort and instruction. May the peace of God ever abide with our much-loved editor and his growing multitude of readers. Yours for his honor and glory.

J. G. WAGGONER.

To a gracious message
Give an host of tongues,
But let ill tidings tell themselves.

Christmas has for every one a gracious message. To thoughtful minds it teaches a varied lesson. For responsive hearts it has a peculiar blessing. Christmas, as observed in Christian homes, keeps alive in many lands the sweetest memory of all the world. At this season all realize the truth of the beautiful saying: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." At no other time does one so appreciate God's best gift to man. Adoring love will find some suitable expression of its gratitude. Christmas has a beautiful ministry, both to children and to older people. May it bring to every heart who reads these lines a message as sweet as the angels sang at the manger in Bethlehem.

"But let us read the message right or no,
Of one good gift from Thee our hearts are sure:
Old we shall never grow
While Thou each year dost come to keep us pure
With legends of our childhood."

N. M. RAGLAND.

Fayetteville, Ark.

I am happy to extend the greetings of the season to the great and, I trust, rapidly increasing family of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Beside Bethlehem's manger the tenderest feelings are stirred and holiest aspirations arise in the soul. May we all learn the most precious lessons of the event. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has presented with clearness, fidelity and courage these saving lessons, while maintaining intellectual freedom and free speech for all. It would be a worthy celebration of the Christmastide if the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST family would increase its circulation ten thousand. Increase our other papers in like proportion and the returns would be beyond our computation in conversions and means. Then will be a heavenly Christmas. To meet there one soul which we have been the means of bringing to Christ will be more joy than all the world could give. Wishing you a merry and a blessed Christmas, I am yours in Christian love,

PERSIS L. CHRISTIAN.

Eureka Springs, Ark.

"Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace among men of good will." Now are the ears of the world open again to catch this heavenly strain. To send this song to the ends of the earth is the mission of the church. To take from it every discordant note and make it an universal chorus is the mission of the Disciples of Christ. Though sung by angel tongues, let it echo in human hearts. Sing it till all the world is one. Sing it till all nations shall send back to the stars this glad Judean hymn.

J. M. LOWE.

Des Moines, Ia.

May Christmas bring genuine joy to our CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST family. Of the four fundamental facts concerning Christ—the Incarnation, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection and the Ascension—the birth in Bethlehem's manger has been especially fruitful of joy. Let us commemorate this glad fact by bringing joy to the hearts of all whom we love. This Christmastide let us especially remember the dear little children and the "Old Folks at Home" with our gifts and messages of joy.

CHAS. A. YOUNG.

University of Virginia.

The angelic anthem — "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people," has been greatly misunderstood and misrepresented by long-faced hypocritical, professed Christians and by much unqualified talk about "giving up a life of pleasure," "having a good time," etc. The Christian is the only life full of the "joy unspeakable" that the world knows not of, and it will manifest itself.

H. A. LEMON, Evangelist.

Bethany, Neb.

Christmas greetings to the preachers, to the missionaries, to the elders and deacons and Sunday school workers, to all the homes where the white-winged messenger of good tidings may come. Let us remember above all the world-wide missionary spirit of the Bethlehem song: "Glad tidings of great joy unto all people," and let us hasten the day when it shall be made real to that whole race.

F. D. POWER.

Washington, D. C.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST ranks high among the first-class religious journals of our day. Its spirit, its teachings and its literary merit all unite to make it a highly valuable religious journal. May it long live, and its circulation widen to promulgate gospel truth, and may its editor long live to contend for New Testament Christianity, and be a great blessing to the church and humanity. May you and your readers enjoy a blessed Christmas.

R. H. BOLTON.

Chelsea, Mass.

Perhaps December 25 is not the time of the birth of Jesus, and yet the fact that he came to the earth in the fullness of time, to teach us how to live by living; how to toil for the uplift of the race by going about doing good; how to serve by serving; how to sacrifice by sacrificing; how to suffer and give our lives for the elevation and happiness of the world about us by giving himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time; that he came into the world to save sinners makes it proper that we should remember his advent with holy joy, for the peace on earth and good will toward men are to us, through Jesus, who was a babe in Bethlehem.

D. R. DUNGAN.

St. Louis, Mo.

Without reserve I wish the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and all who help to make it an honorable and able messenger of the "faithful Word" a blessed Christmas and a year of great prosperity. It is worthy of the highest success it is capable of reaching, and may God bless its editors and patrons most abundantly in Jesus Christ the Lord.

(Concluded on Page 1632)

Correspondence.

Kansas City Letter.

"Of making many books there is no end." Poor old Solomon, with all his learning and kingly leisure for study, despaired of thorough acquaintance with the literature of his day. What would he have said had he faced the printing press of our day, with its unceasing flood of books, magazines and papers, multiplying copies so cheaply as to bring them within the reach of the poorest? It has recently been stated that in thirteen countries the annual output of distinct book publications has reached the astounding figures of 77,250. How many millions of copies of these books have been printed I presume is beyond the statistician's power in mathematics to calculate. Although the United States produced but 5,315 of these books during the past year, yet, with our almost countless magazines and papers of all classes, the attempt to keep up with even American literature would be hopeless. The wise man, therefore, will choose the few works which promise most of profit and pleasure and consent to be ignorant of the thousands of less importance. For Christians there are a few departments of literature which must ever be of supreme value. First of all the Bible, that body of sacred writings in which, through prophet and apostle, God has spoken to man. Next, the history of the Christian Church and the relation to divine truth of the religious communion in which the Christian finds his spiritual home. Then the supreme mission of that church, the evangelization of the world through the gospel of Christ. Within these three realms of thought the follower of Jesus Christ ought to find very much of his mental and spiritual nourishment. And these are the three departments of literature treated in the Bethany Reading Courses. From personal experience and observation I can testify to the great profit and pleasure arising from the study of the handbooks in these courses for the past two years. The present year's course of reading promises to equal in interest either of the preceding. Owing to the delay in securing the books, readers will do well to begin as we have here, studying the first book alone, that of W. J. Lhamon on Modern Heroes of Missions, and follow in turn with the others as soon as they are issued. Families can study them to advantage in the home, and individuals can pursue the course without regard to the formation of a circle. It would be a great blessing if all our members could be persuaded to do this reading.

The church at South Prospect has called Bro. O. P. Shrout, now of Greencastle, Ind., formerly pastor at Belton, Mo., to the pastorate lately vacated by Bro. Thornton, and we learn that he has accepted Bro. S. will be given a warm reception to our city and will do a good work with the cheerful support of the congregation, which we believe he will have.

Three years ago the First Church of this city enjoyed the labors of Bro. B. B. Tyler in a meeting which, though brief in duration, was fruitful in good to the church and community. Bro. Tyler is coming to our aid again, beginning on Sunday, Jan. 7, and we expect to keep him with us longer than before, and to have a still better meeting. His former visit gave Bro. T. a warm place in the hearts of our people and his message will be the more powerful because of the personal esteem in which he is already held.

The state C. E convention, held at Springfield last week, was not so well attended as usual, owing to the necessity for postponing it to so late a date. But judging by the one day of my stay it hardly fell below the usual standard in interest. I had to leave before Bro. A. McLean had arrived, but his coming was anticipated with the highest hope and enthusiasm. Bro. D. W. Moore, pastor of the South St. Church, was in the midst of a successful revival meeting, and the outlook for our work in Springfield was very encouraging.

It is to be regretted that so few of our churches in Missouri are regular contributors to the missionary work in our state. Every congregation ought to be represented on our treasurer's books. Brother Preacher, see that the church for which you preach takes an offering at some time during the year for this work. The fields are white unto the harvest. Let us not neglect to gather the grain.

It is encouraging to see the energy with which our Foreign Board is pressing its claim for $200,000 for 1900. Our churches and other religious organizations ought to place this sum in the hands of that board without any undue urging. The cause demands it, our ability warrants it, our Lord expects it.

With this letter the writer will end his service as the Kansas City correspondent of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Having been asked to write the weekly articles on the Sunday-school lessons for 1900, I have felt that the time required for that important duty would be all I could give to newspaper work. In that column I hope to converse every week of 1900 with the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and to help make the paper what it has ever been, a strengthener of the faith and nourisher of the life of the children of God. For the coming year and a half we shall be studying the life of our Savior in our Bible-schools. What an opportunity to cultivate his acquaintance in the home, in the Bible-school and in the church! Let us make an effort to rally all the church into the Bible-school.

I desire to thank the editors of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST for their exceeding kindness to me during the years of my crude service as correspondent, and many readers for their words of appreciation, which were far warmer than my poor letters deserved. Wishing to one and all a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year, I bid them a loving adieu

W. F RICHARDSON.

Kansas City, Mo., Dec. 12, 1899.

Famine in India.

You are no doubt aware of the fact that there is another dreadful famine in india. Only two years have passed since the last famine. May we call your attention more directly to this sad and distressing situation?

1. The Extent. The famine of '97 affected 90 millions of people. It was worse in central provinces, where most of our mission stations are located. The present famine, now only beginning, affects more than twice the area and population of the previous one. Officially reports show that every province, excepting Bengal and Burma, will be famine ground with more than 200 million people.

2. The Distressing Outlook. There is only a comparatively small reserve of grain in the country. At the beginning of the last famine there was much grain stored away. That was largely used in the famine year and the farmers have not yet refilled their grainaries. Foodstuffs are therefore scarce and command two or three prices now. This was in the middle of October, and the rains do not come till in June. The Bombay Guardian says: "An exceptionally well-informed gentleman, of Berar, said lately that he did not think that more than 60 per cent. of the people would be able to pull through, and only a small per cent. of the animals."

This distressing outlook is intensified by the fact that this is a water famine also. In the last famine rain fell at the wrong season for the crops, but the wells and rivers were filled. This year the rain has not come at any time, and consequently the rivers, wells, tanks, etc, are as low now as in ordinary years they are in April. Large rivers have ceased to flow. The natives already say, "We are drinking mud." A leading railway official is reported as saying: "In four months' time hundreds of miles of railway will be shut down, and not one train of any kind will run over these sections, simply because there will not be water to fill a boiler."

3. What is Being Done. The Government of India is wide awake to the situation. Viceroy Curzon and staff are visiting all India. The government council has sanctioned vast sums of money for relief works. $266 000 has been allowed for importing fodder into Bombay for cattle. In Ajmere district 70,000 people are at work on relief stipend. In central provinces $300,000 has been sanctioned for relief works, giving employment to about four million people for three months. In Panjab 60,000 people are on relief works. In North Bombay 40,000 are employed, while the Bombay presidency has arrangements for feeding 950,000 for three months. The government usually pays four cents per day for men and about three for women—a sufficient arrangement. Yet the government with all its colossal plans and means cannot relieve half the misery.

4. What Shall We Do? Our own and all the missionaries in India are in the midst of all this suffering, agony and death. Already our own native Christians are suffering for food. To be in sight and hearing of hungry, starving men, women and children, crying and dying for bread, without being able to help, is torture of the heart and soul next to starvation itself. We feel, and we believe Christians everywhere will feel the same way when they know the facts, that not to help will be denying the Christ who said, "I was hungry and ye fed me." How shall we get the facts before the people, and how shall we proceed? It has been suggested that all our religious papers open a FAMINE FUND COLUMN and that facts and appeals be made known in this way. We believe our editors will do this Christlike thing. In this way the preachers and churches and people at large will be informed, and then they can adopt their own measures for rendering assistance. The money might be sent to each editor directly and the amount can be forwaded to India by our society treasurers without delay or loss We recommend some such method, and we urge that action be taken immediately. An early gift is better than a later one. It will not only give the poor people food before they are too weak to work or walk, but it will give them confidence in the misionary.

We make our appeal to the most highly favored nation on earth to day, to a great people enjoying plenty and prosperity. Perhaps enough is wasted every day in America to feed all the starving in India. Perhaps God has given us bountifully to bring out the true meaning of brotherhood. These starving people are our neighbors. They are nearer to us than half the states of this republic were to one another 50 years ago. They are our brothers and sisters.

A touching incident has just come from India. In one of the orphanages where sixty boys and girls, saved from starvation three years ago, heard the missionary talking of the present famine, the orphans of their own suggestion and accord left off "dal" and meat from their food for one week and saved $3.00 for the famine fund.

The missionaries in India have appointed December third as a day of prayer for all India We have this week an apropriate day of thanksgiving to Almighty God. Will it not be equally appropriate, and a great blessing and privilege, if we have a day in all our homes and churches for special prayer, self-denial and fasting? Whether by feasting or fasting, whether by plenty or poverty, our appeal and our prayer is that you may hear the cry of the starving in India and help as you would be helped.

The Sunday-school Department.

With the present issue the Sunday school department of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will pass into other hands. This change has been contemplated for sometime. Early in the present year the pressure of other work seemed to make it necessary that the writing of the lessons be committed to some one else. And yet these lessons in the Old Testament were of such surpassing interest, and entered a field so little explored by the average Bible student, that after conference with the editor it was decided that there should be no change at that time. Later in the year, when a crisis was apparently reached in the administration of the paper, when there was a disposition in some quarters to charge the conduct of the Sunday-school department with the responsibility for this crisis, the advisability of an immediate change was presented to the editor by the writer, and the request made that the work be committed to other hands, in order to allay any irritation that might be felt. This suggestion, however, was not entertained, and it was felt to be the best to continue the work until the close of this year. Such has, therefore, been the plan carried out.

The past two years, during which I have had the privilege of preparing the comments upon the international lessons, have yielded no little satisfaction to me, not only because of the privilege of teaching the Holy Scriptures to a large and most important section of our Christian workers, but also owing to the numerous letters that have come from readers in various parts of the country. These letters have expressed varying sentiments—many of them appreciation of help rendered, many of them presenting questions for further light and some containing criticisms of statements made in the comments. For all of these I have been profoundly thankful. Some of the criticisms have been answered in the columns of the paper—this wherever the question was of general interest. Some have been answered privately. But all have been presented with such an apparent desire to find the truth that one was permitted to believe a wide and increasing circle of Christian people is studying with reverence and deep interest in the pages of Holy Scripture.

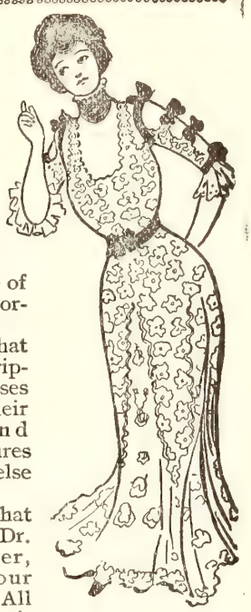
A new day is certainly dawning in the history of Sunday school work. That there are many disadvantages under which we now labor, both in the choice of lessons and in the helps which are furnished for Sunday-school workers, there can be no question. These faults are being gradually remedied, however, and one may be permitted to congratulate the teachers and Sunday school workers of the present generation upon a serious effort made in most quarters to meet their real needs and inspire them to new efforts in the direction of Christian culture. There are many questions which ought never to be taken into the Sunday-school class. As we all agree, questions which are purely critical in their character have no place there, and yet it can never be conceded that Sunday-school teachers are not to be dealt with in a spirit of honesty and fairness when they wish to know what are the commonly accepted positions reached by biblical scholars the world over. It has been the purpose of this department during the past two years to present suggestions of new positions with reference to books or passages of the Scripture only where these suggestions had reached a general degree of acceptance, and even then to present both sides of the question, so that choice could be made. In one or two instances only, where the views presented had passed beyond the limits of general discussion into those of practically unanimous acceptance, has this rule been departed from.

The chief aim of the Sunday-school worker must be to get through methods to truth, through the shell to the kernel. Any plan of Bible study which exhausts itself upon the mere preliminaries and scaffolding will be carried forward to little purpose. The discovery of Christ is ever the first consideration, not alone the facts of his life or the form of his teaching, but the spirit and purposes of his redemptive work. To impart that spirit and to possess that power is the highest ambition of those who teach the Bible. That all teaching and study may conserve this purpose and produce an enthusiasm to live afresh the life of Christ and to have his spirit of love, sympathy, appreciation of all that is good, indignation against all that is impure, narrow, unjust and selfish and to possess his enthusiasm and holy longing for the salvation of the world, is the true end of all Sunday-school as of other Christian work.

I am confident that Bro. Richardson, into whose hands it is a great pleasure to me to know this department of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is committed, will find a large and earnest circle of readers who follow with carefulness and appreciation his weekly expositions of the lessons with which we begin the coming year, that splendid series on the Life of Christ, which is to extend through the coming eighteen months. HERBERT L. WILLETT.

Danger and Opportunities of Wealth.

For sometime the attention of the reading and thinking portion of the church has been directed to questions suggested by a certain class of critics. These questions may or may not be of much importance. Certain it is that salvation does not depend upon settling the questions of by whom, to whom, when and under what circumstances was the Pentateuch written? even including the account of the death of Moses. It matters but little with most of us whether there were two or a half dozen Isaiahs.



The same may be said of most of these speculative questions; but when these "thinkers" begin to think and write about a "mutilated Bible," it seems to me that this is past the danger line. Be this as it may, I wish in this communication to call attention to some of the utterances of this book concerning the rich. Possibly these may be mutilations—some may console themselves with this conclusion. Jesus says (Luke 6:24): "Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation." Luke 18:24, 25: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God. It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." Many of them enter the church, but are they really in the kingdom of God? Are they in Christ and Christ in them? Are they growing into the image of Almighty God—true and loyal subjects of the Heavenly King? What is to become of them? Where are they laying up riches? These are practical questions—they are present, vital questions, upon which salvation to quite a number depends. Again, somebody says in this mutilated book (1 Timothy 6:9, 10): "But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition" (i. e., if there is any perdition). "For the love of money is the root of all evil; which, while some coveted after, have erred from the faith and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." Again, in the portion of the book which has not been reinvestigated, purporting to have been written by James (1:9, 10), we have this language: "Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted; but the rich in that he is made low." Where is the scribe who can record a case of such rejoicing as is mentioned in this last clause?

I venture one more reference, although it may be from the mutilated part of the old book. I refer to Rev. 3:13, a portion of a letter, so called, or message to the Laodiceans. I give it for what it is worth, as I have seen nothing on the reinvestigation of this declaration by these critics. The same writer says to these people, "Because thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods and have need of nothing, and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

In my contact with humanity I have found some people of the Loadicean kind. They are in their estimation all right—rich and in need of nothing. They live in fine houses and have plenty of friends, like the prodigal while his substance lasted. They trust in their riches more than in the living God. What is to become of these? is a question more important than many questions now being discussed in our papers. The farmers may not know it, but they, too, are rich. They may not live in fine houses, they may not be clothed in purple and fine linen, yet they are rich in the sense spoken of in Luke 18:23, 24. They are trusting in cattle, hogs, corn and land more than in the only true God. What is to become of them? What is to become of the preachers who say that all is lovely while these conditions exist and increase. I write these things because I am surprised that our people are so slow in contributing to the two memorial funds started at our recent convention—one for Bro. Atkinson, the other for Sister Younkin. I had thought that these amounts would be raised by our brotherhood immediately. Brethren, let us see to it that these funds are raised at once. Let ministers all over our land strive to induce our rich brethren to use their wealth in these worthy causes and thus save their souls.

The man or woman who loves money, cattle, hogs and lands more than the care of old and disabled ministers of the gospel and helpless orphan children is certainly unworthy of the welcome of the Master. What is to become of these? is a question demanding present attention. J. D. DILLARD.

DON'T FORGET

Don't forget to use Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription for that backache.

Don't forget that over half a million women have been cured of women's ailments by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

Don't forget that "Favorite Prescription" cures diseases of women in their advanced and chronic forms; cures often when all else has failed.

Don't forget that you can consult Dr. Pierce, by letter, free. Tell your story frankly. All correspondence is private. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

Don't forget to write to Dr. Pierce to-day, if you are sick from diseases which afflict women.

"I wrote for advice February 4, 1896," writes Mrs. Lena Halstead, of Claremore, Cherokee Nat., Ind. Ty. "I was racking with pain from the back of my head down to my heels. Had hemorrhage for weeks at a time, and was unable to sit for ten minutes at a time. You answered my letter, advised me to use your valuable medicines, viz.: Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, 'Golden Medical Discovery,' and 'Pleasant Pellets,' also gave advice about injections, baths and diet. To my surprise, in four months from the time I began your treatment I was a well woman and have not had the backache since, and now I put in sixteen hours a day hard work."

The Case of Brigham H. Roberts.

I very strongly dissent from the position of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on the subject of unseating Brigham Roberts. You quote approvingly the petition of the Reform League which, it seems to me, contains a misstatement. The covenant of statehood did not stipulate that the people of Utah would not elect a polygamist to Congress. Roberts is not different to-day from what he was in 1894. The marriages were solemnized before statehood Has the State of Utah "broken its solemn covenant with the nation" in electing him to Congress? If so, state specifically how.

Would it help matters to unseat him? Will it check polygamy? Would it not be un-American and wrong to unseat him, thus trampling upon the expressed will of the sovereign citizens of Utah and invading their rights?

Is there any consistency in waging a warfare against the contemporaneous polygamy of Roberts and ignoring the consecutive polygamy of others?

While the constitution gives the House the right to judge as to the qualification of its members, is it not establishing a dangerous precedent to drag in the domestic relations of a man as a test of his right, upon election, to represent the sovereign people in Congress? Does Roberts represent a majority of the people of Utah? Are other states, through their congressmen, or are the citizens of Utah, by their ballots, to determine who shall represent the people of that state in Congress?

You call upon those who are "interested in the purity and perpetuity of the home" to circulate these petitions in order to unseat Mr. Roberts. Are the American people in any immediate danger of madly rushing into polygamy, forfeiting our purity and our homes because he sits in Congress? Had it not been for the awful wail raised by what seems to me the easily frightened ones, seventy millions of people would hardly have known whether he had one wife or a dozen.

The place and time to defeat Roberts are in Utah in next fall's election; not by unseating a man honestly elected and thus violating the rights of his constituency.

VERNON J. ROSE.

Newton, Kan.

The forgoing article seems to us to have been written under a singular misapprehension of the issues involved in this protest against the seating of this polygamous congressman from Utah. It is alleged concerning Mr. Roberts that he is living in a state of unlawful cohabitation with two or more wives since Utah became a state and continuously up to the present time. It is well understood that Utah was admitted as a state with the distinct understanding that its polygamy had been discontinued. Mr. Roberts has, therefore, violated this compact and the people of Utah electing him have also acted in bad faith towards the United States. To his question, "Would it help matters to unseat him?" we answer: Undoubtedly it will help matters to prevent him from being seated, as seems to be the purpose of the present Congress. It has already had a most decided moral effect on the country. No event in the history of Congress, in modern times, has done more to evince the force of a moral public sentiment concerning the sacredness of the home and the marriage relation than the almost universal refusal of that body to admit Mr. Roberts to a seat in Congress.

We are unable to undertand our brother's question in reference to the consistency of "making a warfare against the contemporaneous polygamy of Roberts and ignoring the consecutive polygamy of others." If this question means that our brother regards a second or third marriage after the loss of a first or second wife as in the same category with having a plurality of wives at the same time, the question answers itself. If he refers to the repeated marriages of those who are divorced on unscriptural grounds, this is another crime and has a different remedy. The question in connection with Roberts is not a religious question, but a legal question. As long as congressmen-elect violate the laws of the land in their domestic relations by having a plurality of wives, it is entirely within the province of Congress to "drag" their "dometic relations" into the halls of Congress.

In answer to the last question which our brother raises we would say that every state is bound to elect men to the United States Congress who are eligible to membership in that body. They cannot elect a man without regard to his age, his citizenship and his moral fitness.

If our brother thinks the American people are in no danger from the polygamous cancer in Utah and other Western states, it is probably because he has given little thought to this subject. It is quite probable that if the newspapers and Congress had said nothing about the polygamous relations of Roberts the country at large might have remained in ignorance of this fact. But would that have been a gain? Is it not a distinct victory for the home and its sacredness, that the fact is being widely known and that the people have protested with such unanimity as to make it impossible for him to sit in Congress? It is in evidence that the Mormons of Utah who voted for Roberts did so with the distinct purpose to test the question as to whether a man ahhering to the Mormon practice of polygamy could be permitted to a seat in the United States Congress. Had he been seated and permitted to remain a member of Congress, they would have regarded it as a victory for polygamy and he would have been re-elected. But now that the people have spoken, neither Mr. Roberts nor any other polygamist will ever be elected again in Utah to the United States Congress. Such will be the salutary influence of this action of the people, the press and of Congress.—EDITOR.

Things Picked Up.

A preacher now past seventy, well known in our brotherhood, of good ability and who, like many other good preachers, has frequently changed his field of labor, stated to me not long since that if he had his life to live over again as a preacher, he would make just as few moves as possible; that he would continue in a church until such time as it became absolutely necessary for him to leave.

His thought was that frequent changes are both ruinous to the preacher and to the church; and that a preacher, as a general rule, should remain in a field just as long as there was any reasonable chance for him to succeed, or to overcome any opposition there might be in the church to him as their pastor.

How true it is that the way of the transgressor is hard. Last spring a young lawyer of my acquaintance had before him the very brightest of prospects. As an attorney he was brilliant, and was working up a splendid practice in a good county seat. His praise was on many lips, and he bid fair to become one of the foremost attornies in his county. But in a few days his bright prospects have fled and he falls so low that it is doubtful if he can ever recover what he has lost.

The temptation to make money rapidly was so strong that he resorted to criminal means to gain this end, and the rest is easily told. By grossly dishonest practice in his profession for the sake of money, while seeking to ruin the character of an innocent victim he ruined himself. His sin found him out, as sin always will those who are deceived by it, and he is now suffering the consequences. Young men, beware! The world is full of men whose lives have been damned by double-dealing. Have a clear conscience, even though you do not have coin. Manhood is greater riches than millions of money. Be sure your sins will find you out. Nothing succeeds except honesty.

I knew a man when I was a boy who belonged to the church. He attended church regularly, "said grace" before and after meals, gave liberally of his means to build a church and support preachers, read his Bible and sang psalms on the "Sabbath." And yet, that man was cruel to his poor, sick wife, so penurious that he dunned a man for a cent, and took the bed from under a poor widow who was unable to pay him all the rent she owed him for his house she was living in.

I saw this man a few years ago, and he was still the same, except he was older and much nearer his grave. Though still a leader in the church, he had made his property over to his wife to avoid paying his debts.

This man's religion, like that of a good many others, was on the exterior. It was not even skin-deep. It had not struck in, so to speak, and was not likely to do so. There was little danger of its attacking his vitals. It was worn partly as a cloak and partly to soothe his conscience. And, like many others, I am inclined to think that this man was deceived into the belief that he had a fairly good chance for heaven. But even as a cloak this man's religion was vain. It did not hide his spiritual deformity from the gaze of men, to say nothing about God.

Reader, it will not do any harm, and may do us much good, to once in a while carefully read Matt. 7:21-27. H. T. MORRISON.

COFFEE EYES.

Diseased and Weak Eyes Helped by Leaving off Coffee.

"Father would never let his two daughters drink coffee, so until I was married, I never learned to like it. When baby came, some of my lady friends advised me to take up tea and coffee, which I did, on their advice. Shortly after, I became extremely nervous, and my eyes began to trouble me. This grew until I could neither read or sew and the inflammation and pain was great.

"Our good doctor was baffled, and advised a shaded room. For a month I lived in darkness. My appetite failed; yet, to keep up, I still took the tea and coffee. Finally I went to visit in a family that used Postum Food Coffee instead of common coffee. I began to improve daily, and at the end of four weeks returned home, taking with me a package of Postum, and told the cook to prepare it for breakfast, but not one of us could drink the flat, insipid stuff, as served that morning.

"Suddenly we remembered poor Bridget could not read. I had the Postum prepared according to directions, and found we could make it as well as my friend had. When the package gave out, it was so far from our ranch to the store, that we began to use some old-fashioned coffee we had in the house. At once my eyes began to inflame and pain. I naturally concluded that coffee was the cause of it; just why or how, no one could say, but I immediately discontinued the coffee, and as soon as some new Postum could be secured, began to use it again.

"This was four years ago, and since that time my eyes have given me no trouble but once; then I visited some friends, and rather than appear fussy, drank coffee whenever they did, anticipating no bad results, for my eyes had been strong so long, but in a day the head began to ache above the eyes and the eyes became bloodshot, and before the end of the week were so bad I was obliged to go home. No temptation since has been enough to make me touch coffee, and whenever I find a listener, I sing the praises of Postum Food Coffee. My father, who had been a coffee-user so many years, died while yet in his prime 'Stomach and heart trouble,' the doctor said. Poisoned by coffee, I absolutely know." Mrs. Lena Austin, Placerville, Idaho.

Death of W. H. Hayden.

Elder Will H. Hayden, son of A. S. Hayden, was called to his reward on the morning of Dec. 14, in his forty-sixth year. His death, which occurred at the Hayden homestead in suburban Cleveland, was caused by acute pneumonia. Bro. Hayden graduated from Bethany in 1878, and for twenty years was a minister among us, laboring efficiently for the churches with which he has been associated as pastor. He began work at Chester, O. Since then he has served as pastor in the churches of Washburn and Waukegan, Ill., Willoughby, O., and Wheeling, West Virginia. In Willoughby and also in Wheeling his work covered a period of five years. He organized the churches of Gibson City and Sheldon, Ill., and was for a short time missionary to Jamaica, but was compelled to resign on account of ill health. Besides filling these important places he spent sometime as an evangelist, and through his teaching many have been led to accept the Savior.

For the last two years he has been battling with disease, and being unable to bear the burdens of his regular work has lived at the old homestead, worshiping with the church in Collinwood and preaching occasionally. Under these circumstances the writer became acquainted with the family only a few months ago.

During the last few weeks the dread disease that has hovered over him so long seemed to be relaxing its hold, and his faithful wife and loved children who have been so long under the shadow of uncertainty were just beginning to rejoice at the prospect of returning health. Lord's day, Dec. 10, he was at the morning service as usual and assisted in the communion. He spoke in a touching manner of the value of the institution to himself, and tenderly exhorted the brethren to faithfulness in its observance. Later, in personal greeting, he spoke of the benefit he had received from the nursing service and said that he was much stronger than usual, but he was simply gathering strength for his final departure. We all feel that his humble walk among us, his unwavering fidelity and simple trust in Christ has been of more consequence than sermons. His faithful wife, who has loyally borne her part in all the affairs of his life, and four lovely children remain with us. May the Lord abide with them. J. N. SCHOLES.

Sowing in Sinim.

Missions have to deal with a "psychological climate." It is this climatic environment in particular which exercises such formative and controlling influences over the spiritual fortunes and destinies of men. Just as in warm, tropical countries there is quick and profuse growth in all vegetation, so, also, it is a fact that there are religious atmospheres and moral strata in which germinate and expand the seed principles of righteousness in contradistinction to the more cold, analytical and materialistic decay of mere civilization.

While it is true that Eastern lands are more susceptible of quick revolutions of thought in their warm religious and philosophical surroundings, yet it is also strikingly noticeable that in China the "seed of the kingdom," as a living organism, takes time to acclimatize itself to its peculiar soil. Perhaps nowhere else in the whole field of missionary enterprise is so much conservatism encountered. Venerable and defiant philosophers, hoary traditions, cherished superstitions and a sacred regard for their own classical lore bind them to convictions as ivy clings around the old homestead.

There is, however, much cause for hopefulness. A century of Christian missionary effort has opened the heart of China and the Chinese to the gospel. This century of history is vivid with tragic events. China is awakening. She is admitting that some of her lights have failed. A hundred millions are to-day in the arena of Christian missionary effort. A hundred thousand Chinese have forsaken idolatry and believed on the Lord Jesus Christ. A million Chinese are under direct Christian influence through our schools, colleges, orphanages, industrial schools, hospitals and dispensaries, village churches and central city Christian churches, besides the great and consecrated band of native missionary agents. In the faithfulness, self-reliance and Spirit-guided lives of these last-named lies the faithfulness and destiny of the Christian Church in China. W. R. HUNT.

An Explanation.

BRETHREN: — Inasmuch as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST published an item in the Budget of the 7th inst., taken from a private note, I beg leave to make this brief explanation: My retiring from the "ministry of the Word" was not a voluntary or willing step, but a necessity, and it has been a source of grief and mortification to me. I have attempted to supplement my salary in several ways in the last three years, but in every case the churches seemed to get the idea that I was supporting myself; then my age and efforts seemed to be against me. I am not physically disabled, neither have I anything to retire on, except my physical strength, which I intend to use. I had a farm when I entered the ministry and was making a comfortable living; if my debts were paid I would not have a dollar now. I am 55 years of age, and the sad part of my life is, after serving the cause I love, and to which I believe I have been true and loyal, my services were not wanted. I am thus compelled to seek employment elsewhere or beg the churches to give me work. Therefore, before old age and decrepitude come upon me I hope to provide a place I can call home, where my wife and children can meet around our family altar, the fires of which have never gone out for more than 30 years. It is humiliating to take this step, but circumstances compel me to do so. Experience teaches me that a person cannot succeed with two things, therefore I cannot pose as a preacher of the gospel and make my bread some other way. But as the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST said, I don't expect to quit the Lord's service. I expect to serve him day and night as long as I live; and if my brethren, wherever my lot is cast, think me worthy or competent, I am as willing to preach as any soul on earth, but the solicitation must come without my seeking it.

Yours in the hope of everlasting life,

B. C. STEPHENS.

[There was nothing in Bro. Stephens' letter to indicate that the information it contained was not for the public; besides, it afforded us an opportunity for a word on the subject. It emphasizes the importance of a growing problem for the church to meet in the near future. We are glad to give our readers Bro. Stephens' explanation and can assure him of our sympathy.—EDITOR.]

A Holy Ministry.

Expressions of appreciation have much to do in fostering many interests, and this is especially true where such expressions can be made in a substantial way. December 17 is the day of our opportunity, an opportunity to express to the Father of all our appreciation of the work of the fathers of the great Restoration movement, the blessings of whose labors and sacrifices we are now enjoying. The fathers of this movement were noble men, self-sacrificing and uncompromising. Their devotion to truth made possible the religious marvel of the century. Many of them have fallen in the conflict; a few of them, or their good wives, remain, with only the possession of noble records. They served faithfully and efficiently their day and generation. God has permitted them to remain with us in this condition that we, their children in the faith, might have the blessing of caring for them. Devotion to the cause we love, and for which their lives were given, will not allow that the few who remain shall ever suffer want. While they need the blessing of our gifts, we much need the blessing of the giving. As long as it remains a truth in the Book of God that "it is more blessed to give than to receive," we cannot do good unto others without ourselves being made better. Loving is giving. If we do not love, brethren, let us give and continue to give until we learn to love. Not only the care of these worthy ones, but our own happiness is here involved; and not only this, but the spirit of the Restoration is to be maintained and the glory of God manifested to the world. O that we could all know how we are linked together in this matter, and that our love to God is manifest in our love to the brethren, and loving is giving. A. L. ORCUTT.

Notes and News.

Read that Letter to the Church.

Five hundred letters have been sent to as many Illinois churches, requesting them to send us from $5.00 to $50.00 to help keep down debt. This note is to earnestly urge those receiving the letters to bring the subject promptly before the churches and secure action without fail. The permanent fund is growing. Until it is large enough to carry the institution the churches will have to supplement its income with offerings such as they make for missions year by year. We are having a good year with increased attendance. Send us a new student for the winter term, which begins Jan. 2. J. H. HARDIN, Pres.

C. W. B. M. Letter.

Dear Sisters of the Missouri C. W. B. M.:—We have been to our "Jerusalem," to the Jubilee, and rejoiced over the 25 silver years and 50 golden years of missionary activity. It is now ours to press forward and do our share toward reaching the high mark set for us at the convention: 100,000 women and $130,000 for 1900. This will be a fitting close to this "woman's century" by our C. W. B. M.

Our national board proposes, along the line of new work, the opening of a mission in Calcutta, India, with Bros. Ragland and Forrest in charge, two of our ablest and most consecrated men. The work in Mexico will be pushed forward and the Virginia Bible Chair is to be endowed. What share in all this shall Missouri have?—Missouri the peerless, the "sleeping giant," as some one has said, with her 161,000 Disciples, with her infinite resources and boundless possibilities. Shall we be content with less than 6,000 women and $10,000 as our share for the coming year?

At our recent state convention, owing to a lack of time, the committee on ways and means did not report. At the meeting of the advisory board, the resolutions were read and unanimously adopted. They are as follows:

Realizing that state development is the one thing needful, we recommend—

1. That competent organizers be kept busy in the field as much of the time as the state of the treasury will permit.

2. That the auxiliaries be urged to make more liberal contributions to the state fund in order that Missouri may be enabled to take a long step forward during the next year.

3. That a committee of three be appointed to prepare a state constitution to be presented and considered at our convention at Moberly in 1900. Respectfully submitted,

MRS. A. B. JONES,
MRS. M. M. GOODE,
MRS. E. L. PEDDICORD.

Organization is, therefore, to be the chief word in our vocabulary this year. Organizers must be sent out immediately and kept in the field the most of the time. In order to do this our state fund must be largely increased. Will not every auxiliary member in the state give one dollar this year for this purpose? Sisters, 161,000 church members in this state and less than 3,000 in auxiliaries! These figures should rouse us to the importance of the work to be done in our own state and make us determine it shall be done. Let us stand together in love, with an energy born of faith, and our efforts will be blessed by Him who said, "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end." MRS F. M. LOWE,
President Mo. C. W. B. M.

State Mission Notes.

It is a joy always to record a good deed, and it is an unalloyed pleasure to tell of the one we now have in mind. At the Jefferson City convention Brother W. H. McClain, who was president, handed the secretary a pledge of $50, telling him to call for it when needed most. The receipts of the past month have been so meager that I saw without immediate response from some quarter it would be impossible to pay the men. I waited till the last moment, hoping that we would hear from some of our churches, but it did not come and I sent him word that the money was needed and it came by return mail, the full amount. God bless the heart that made the pledge and the hand that forwarded it so promptly in the time of need.

But we have many others who can do fully as well if they will. May we not hope that this example will be an inspiration to others to do likewise? Indeed, it is a strange thing to me that many of our well-to-do brethren do not come to our assistance in this work. Our Baptist brethren report a large number of splendid contributions to state work and our brethren in other states do it, but in Missouri there seems to be almost a total failure at this point. Many of the states have some endowment for the state mission work. Iowa, Illinois, Ohio, Kentucky and several others, but not one dollar has ever been willed for that purpose in our own state. Why is this? We have territory in which help will always be needed; it is more and more apparent to the thinking, observing man that the work of the state convention will be needed for years to come. Yet, strange to say, no permanent provision is being made for it.

At letter before me at present writing from one who is traveling extensively in the state says that the interest in state missions is enlarging. He says: "I find the preachers getting roused on the subject, and you know the Missouri preachers can make this thing go or stop it forever." Yes, I know it. They have a wonderful power. I have prayed that I might get them to see it and use it aright. I am still praying. Lord, increase our faith!

I am just in receipt of the report of the man for whom I have asked personal contributions to support for November; he reports 16 days' work and 24 added to the saved, a weak church put on its feet and provision made to supply the pulpit. Yet, it seems I must call this man from the field. I would support him unaided if I could, but this is impossible, and unless I get immediate response I must call this man from the most needy field in the state of Missouri. Brethren, shall it be?

It is said that wise men change, fools never do. In 1898 the state mission day was changed from January to November. We have tried it faithfully two years and we find that it is a failure, and the board has unanimously voted that we go back to the second Sunday in January.

Will the churches please take notice? Our treasury is empty and must be filled. Will you not during the coming month take up your collection and raise your apportionment for state missions?

Will not the assistant corresponding secretaries just appointed get into correspondence at once with the preachers and churches in their territory and do all in their power to induce an offering from each church during the month? And that eternal persistence is the price of success. The year's work for goodor for evil hangs largely here. Let all note the change and act accordingly.

Ministerial Relief.

The third Lord's day in December is the te for the annual offering for Ministerial lief.

No cause appeals more strongly to our sensi- ities than that of caring for our infirm and dy ministers. The fathers who toiled hard h little compensation; the men who made sible our great Jubilee Convention; the orers who went to sow the seed of the king- n and now, in their old age, are in financial tress, should appeal to us most earnestly to ke this offering the crown of the year. "In- nuch as ye have done it unto one of these brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Let a liberal free will offering be made and t to Howard Cale, 120 E. Market Street, lianapolis, Ind.

Every preacher owes it to his brethren in ministry, and possibly owes it to himself, make strong the cause of Ministerial Relief, l the way to get a man to love a cause is to him to give something for that cause.

Baghdasarian Fund.

A few years ago Bro. M. Baghdasarian, who d been educated at Drake University, was t by the brethren in Iowa as a missionary Persia. He has been able to do but little on count of his lack of financial support and the dition of things there. He has a wife and o children, and writes that he is in dire dis- ss and begs his American brethren for re- f. Nothing is alleged against his moral aracter, so far as we have heard. It was obably unwise to send him alone into such a d. We are sure it is not Christian or even mane to leave him there to suffer. In re- onse to an appeal from him in these columns metime ago, the following sums were sent bring Bro. B. and his family back to this untry: C. W. B. M., Oak Hill, Tex., $5.00, P. The Church Extension Fund Growing.

Sunday, December 10, was a special day for our Church Extension in the First Christian Church and Broadway Christian Church, Louisville, Ky. The Secretary of Church Extension was present in the interest of reaching our first quarter of a million dollars for that important work by the time of our next National Convention. The Broadway Church pledged $700, to be paid in five years by annual installments; however, a large part of it is to be paid during this year. Brother Charles A. Thomas, pastor of the Broadway Church, and his Official Board say that it shall not end at $700, but that this sum will be greatly increased at the time of the Annual Offerings. Though it was a rainy day there was a full house and great enthusiasm about helping to reach the quarter of a million mark. At a meeting of the Official Board of the First Christian Church on the same day it was enthusiastically and unanimously voted to establish a Five Thousand Dollar Named Loan Fund in our Church Extension work, to be paid in through a series of years. The good will with which this fund was voted deserves special notice. It will be remembered that the First Christian Church is one of the Living Link Churches of our Foreign Society. The voting of this Named Loan Fund for Church Extension will create special interest for that work and give added enthusiasm to the missionary work of this great church. Other churches ought to follow the example of this church. Special good may be done this year by establishing these Named Loan Funds because of the effect to reach $250,000 by the time of our next National Convention.

A Named Loan Fund is created by subscribing $5,000 or more to be paid at once or through a series of years. It is generally paid in ten or fifteen years. The Fund so created is named after the donor, and as loans are made from this Fund to build mission churches, the interest on these loans is never used to pay current expenses, but goes to build up the Fund by the multiplying power of compounding itself semi-annually. A separate account is kept of each Named Loan Fund and all interest and returning principal are annually increasing the working power of the Fund. For example, F. M. Drake created his Loan Fund by giving $1,000 in 1888. He paid the remaining $4,000 within the next ten years by equal annual payments. During the time it was paid in his Fund built twenty-nine churches by the money coming and going through the admirable plan of Church Extension. No one could better lay up treasure in heaven and become rich toward God and more helpful toward our missions than by putting money into a Named Loan Fund for Church Extension. There are now eight of these Funds, three having been created by churches. The first church to give one was Frankford, Ky. Cedar Rapids, Ia., quickly followed, and the latest is from the First Church at Louisville. Let other churches and individuals quickly follow in order that we may have rejoicng at the Jubilee Aftermath for Church Extension at Kansas City next October.

Sleighing.

BY MRS. LISA A FLETCHER.

Tinkle, tinkle, go the bells,
As swiftly o'er the snow we slip,
Up the hills and down the dells,
With happy smiles upon the lip.

Passing meadows white with snow,
Which in summer dreamed in flowers,
Where in May the violets blow
And bird songs fall in happy showers.

Down into a shadowy glen,
Where a brook erewhile hath slipped,
But patient now waits spring again,
Cold and voiceless, frozen lipped.

On into the forest deep,
Where great pines their arms outspread,
And lowly ferns their vigils keep,
Fair tokens of the summer dead.

Swift and swifter gliding on,
Nerves a tingle with delight,
Faster now the breath is drawn,
For oh, for on, this seems like flight.

Tinkle, tinkle, go the bells,
As swiftly o'er the snow we glide,
Up the hills and down the dells,
With joyous praise for wintertide!

Manchester, N H

Makin' Things Square.

BY ALICE CURTICE MOYER.

It was the day before Christmas. I was riding along one of the most picturesque roads that it had ever been my good fortune to travel. I had recently invested in some mining property that required my immediate attention in person, hence my journey to Colorado at this most unpropitious season. I went by rail to within ten miles of my destination. That I might be safely conveyed over this remaining ten miles I engaged a man who was recommended to me as one who knew the road well and who understood driving. I had no cause to regret that I engaged him. He called my attention to many points of interest and pointed out so many "claims"—holes in the ground in which had been sunk the hard-earned savings of so many poor fellows who had to come to the mountains after a fortune—that I no longer wondered that the country so abounds with stories of tragedy and tales of romance.

We were passing over a piece of road that seemed to have been so squarely cut from the mountain side that I remarked concerning it.

"It was cut out," replied my new traveling companion. "This piece of road is new. The projection over which the old one ran was swept away, pushed down into the gorge below. Look up; and if you know anything about the habits of the country you will understand." I looked upward as directed. I was little learned in the "habits" of the country, but the great bald space on the side of the mountain that sloped upward and away from us to a great height could have but one explanation. There had at some time been a large snowslide.

"It happened exactly two years ago today," said the driver, "and is known in these parts as the Hank Morris Slide. Why? Well I'll tell you. I wouldn't be apt to talk about anything else the rest of the way nohow, for the sight of this spot knocks all thought of anything else out o' me for the time. For if it hadn't been for brave Hank Morris I wouldn't be a drivin' you over this road to-day. It was this way: Hank and me was workin' our claims in and around the gulch down yonder—you know we have to work 'em just so much every year or lose 'em. We had been mighty busy all summer and had to take a winter season for it. So we rented a snug little cabin and set up to housekeepin', or batchin', properly speakin'. Just as we was about half through our job I was taken down sick with a fever. Hank dropped everything to take care of me and—but say, stranger, I reckon I ought to 've told you something about Hank himself first. He was one of the best hearted fellers on earth, Hank was; but his quick temper was continually gettin' the best of him. And one day when a feller tried to cabbage onto one of his claims—well, the next day there was a funeral down to the village. Hank was always sorry for the things he'd do and say when he was mad, after it was all over, but this time, I never saw anything like it. We had to watch him for fear he would commit a still greater sin by takin' his own life. After it was too late he saw what givin' way to his temper had finally brought him to. After the funeral was over he said: 'Fellers, you needn't watch me. I ain't no notion of doin' what you think. God knows I ain't fit to die.' And from that day on, Hank was a changed man. 'Murderers can't go to heaven, you know, Jack,' he would say to me in a way that would bring tears to my eyes, 'an' I want to do what good I can while I am in this world.' Poor feller! He couldn't be made to understand that there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repents than over the ninety and nine that do not go astray. He had truly repented. He longed for mercy. Nothing on earth could have tempted him to commit another such deed. An', stranger, when a man reaches that point, it's my belief that right then and there God is ready to forgive him. But Hank could not be made to understand that. 'It's no use arguing, Jack,' he would say, pitifully. 'The Pearly Gates is forever closed agin me. I know it.'

"But one day—I'll never forget it—we were resting after our lunch. Hank had taken his Bible out to read while we rested. Presently he passed the book over to me, pointin' to a marked passage. The page was worn, showin' signs of much handlin'. The passage was this: 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.' 'Jack,' said he, 'if I could only have the opportunity for saving the life of some friend, might it make things square?' He didn't seem to expect an answer an' I didn't make one. If Hank could find any consolation in such interpretation of that passage, I wasn't the feller to take that one grain of comfort away from him. So the time passed. An' as I was sayin', before I stopped to tell this episode in Hank's life, I was taken down sick and Hank dropped everything to take care of me. It looked several times as if I was about ready to pass in my checks, but Hank's good nursin' pulled me through. An' at last I began to get better in real earnest. I could sit up a little and enjoy the messes Hank fixed for me. Christmas was comin' on, but we knew we'd be compelled to celebrate it in our mountain cabin, so we said nothin' agin it.

Some of the boys promised to make us a Christmas visit, but about four days before that event it began to snow so terrifically that we knew we would spend Christmas alone. 'I wish I could get down to the village after a turkey or somethin', though,' Hank said. 'The boys were planning to bring one along and surprise you.' I wouldn't hear to his attemptin' the trip, so we made up our minds to get along with what we had and pass the time as best we could. We talked, read over our old books and watched it snow.

"Say, you people who live in the lower altitudes don't know anything about the beauty of the beautiful snow. Wait till you can look up, up, up and see the vapory, feathery flakes dropping down in straight lines through the rarified air, each one separate and distinct, outlined against the great dark background of the mountain side, then you'll know somethin' about the beauties of a snowstorm. Well, it kept it up all that day an' night an' all the next day and night an' the next—the same great stillness and the same steady downpour. We were accustomed to snow, but three days an' nights of it without stoppin' was a little unusual. The next day would be Christmas Eve and we went to bed wonderin' what would be the result of such a storm and whether it would last very much longer. We were glad upon awaking the next morning to find that the storm had ceased, but when about 10 o'clock the temperature began to rise, our hearts began to sink. Our position was certainly not one to be hankered after. We knew that if we should get the right sort of wind with that rise in temperature, there was a chance of our being wiped out of existence before the rise of another sun. But we could do nothing only wait and hope.

"The afternoon began to wane. My thoughts went back to the time before I had ever heard of the diggins, where, in the twinkle of an eye, people became paupers and millionaires. I was a child again. The darkness was lit up and warmed by cozy fires. With my brothers and sisters I was goin' to hang up my stockin' before being tucked away to dream of what Santa Claus would bring to us There was a vision of a dear mother-face bending over me for a last good-night's caress. Then Christmas morning dawned and a great, comforting, loving kiss fell upon the poor, restless old world and it awoke with its heart full of joy and Christmas greetings. So wrapped up was I in my half-awake thoughts that I was quite startled when Hank turned from the window, saying calmly:

" 'Jack, here it comes.'

"I sprang up an' with all the strength I had tottered over to the window. At a glance I saw that the peculiar lay of the land at that point would probably make it possible for one to escape from the cabin if attempted at once. Hank, at least, must save himself. He understood my thought, but shook his head. 'No, Jack,' said he, 'I'll not leave you. We'll die together.'

"How can I ever describe what followed? I cannot. We looked from our little window at the great deadly ocean of snow swiftly crowding down upon us to crush out our lives. In less time than it takes me to tell it, it was upon us. I have a dim recollection of Hank's arms being thrown about me and of being shielded by him by his own body; of falling logs and darkness.

"When my senses returned I was lying on the clean-swept ground; the snow was in the gulch. 'You are all right Jack,' said Hank's voice, feebly, at my side. You see we only got the tail end of it and were thrown out before we reached the gulch. 'I brought you as far as I could, Jack. The trail to the Bonanza is not fur away. The boys will know of our danger an' will be apt to come to see about us. I hope they will find you before it is to late to—'

"I raised myself the best I could that I might see him better in the fast-fading light. He was covered with blood. There was a gash on his forehead and he pressed one side with his hand. Then I understood it all.

" 'Hank,' I cried, 'you saved me, but it has been at the cost of your own life.' He smiled. And O, how his face lighted up. His lips moved and I bent over him that I might not lose a word: 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for a friend,' said he. 'Jack,' he whispered presently, 'do you think—it might—make things square—up there?' " And with his eyes lifted heavenward, his soul went into the presence of the great Judge.

My companion stopped to dry his eyes, and I confess that my own we moist. He continued:

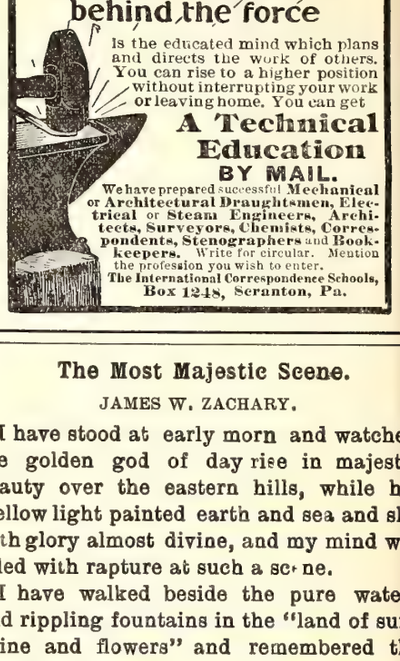
"I lay there beside the pore feller with such thoughts as I had never had before. The boys from the Bonanza, knowing that we were alone and probably in danger, came to see about us before it was too late so far as I myself was concerned."

We were now entirely past the bald side of the mountain and my companion pointed to a well-kept mound, near which was a log building, saying:

"There, stranger, is his grave, and that building is our meetin' house. When I lay beside pore dead Hank on that Christmas Eve night on the cold ground with only the stars over me, I vowed that if I was rescued and my life spared I would try to do at least a little good in the world, an' I am doing what I can. I built this log house an' started a sort of Sunday-school for the children of the miners who come up here during the summer. At first the attendance was small, but I just kept right on, prayin' an' workin', an' last summer it was surprisin' to see the interest shown. Not only did the children attend, but the parents came with them. The building is shabby an' the furniture is shabbier, but the Spirit is there an' that is all the comfort we need.

"I don't pretend to sit in judgment on Hank, stranger. I don't pretend to say whether he was right or wrong in his idea of makin' things square. But certain it is that Hank's layin' down his life fer me has been the cause of buildin' up such an interest in the Bible as was never seen before in these diggins. Mind, stranger, I am not losin' sight of the crucified one who gave his life for all of us, but might it not be that pore Hank was allowed to be, in his humble way, a great instrument for bringin' about this foundation for the great harvest of souls that I feel sure this interest is growing into? And might it not be after all that he did make things square?"

And as we reined up at our destination these words, as though in answer, came to to me: "O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"



Castles.

LAURENE HIGHFIELD.

When weary and discouraged,
Our hearts o'erwhelmed with care,
Our burdened souls take refuge
In castles in the air;
Which, in imagination,
Uplift their glittering towers,
Where everything we've longed for
And dreamed of shall be ours.
Peopled with perfect people,
Bedecked with jewels rare,
With riches, fame and honor,
And pleasures ever where.
But though each dazzling palace
Is built with thoughtful care,
As transient as soap-bubbles
Are castles in the air.
Oh, wayworn, tired dreamer,
In faith lift up your eyes,
And see with clearer vision
The hills of Paradise,
Where rise the heavenly mansions
Prepared by God's own hand;
Transcending all thy fancies,
They evermore shall stand.
Planted by living waters,
Clothed in a radiant light
That shines from Him who ruleth
In strength and power and might.
Jewels that are eternal,
Pleasures beyond compare,
Without a touch of sorrow,
Of pain or tears or care.
Walls of celestial radiance,
Rising from streets of gold,
Whose glory is unfading,
Whose wealth cannot be told;
Rare gems of grace and beauty,
Of truth and joy and love
Adorn the heavenly city
Of palaces above.
Brighter than all thy visions,
Than all thy dreams more fair,
They ne'er will fade nor vanish
Like castles in the air.

The Most Majestic Scene.

JAMES W. ZACHARY.

I have stood at early morn and watched the golden god of day rise in majestic beauty over the eastern hills, while his mellow light painted earth and sea and sky with glory almost divine, and my mind was filled with rapture at such a scene.

I have walked beside the pure waters and rippling fountains in the "land of sun shine and flowers" and remembered the beautiful lines:

"There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanual's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains."

Standing on the top of lofty Pike's Peak more than fourteen thousand miles above the sea, I have gazed with ravished eyes over forty thousand square miles of picturesque landscape—bedecked with farms, cities and alpine towns underlaid with mines of silver and gold—and to me it seemed that the landscape declared the glory of God and the age-lasting mountains showed his handywook.

I have stood upon the beach of the boundless sea and watched the foaming billows like white horses tramping across the prairies of the ocean, and my heart has been enraptured with ecstasy in contemplation of glorious nature, the sea of God's infinite love and the sinless summerland where not a wave of trouble shall roll across my peaceful breast; but never, ah! never, has my soul been filled with such admiration and awe profound, such compassion and love divine, as when by faith I stand on Calvary's brow, beside the cross, surrounded by a reviling mob and with such love as was never known before hear my Savior for his enemies pray: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" Then, under darkening skies, amid opening graves and rending rocks upon the trembling earth in fancy I behold the Son of God, the Savior of man, bow his thorn-crowned head upon his blood-stained breast and cry: "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?" that is to say, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Upon each sacred Lord's day as we come around the table of the Lord, to eat his memorial supper, let us transport ourselves upon the wings of faith to this most majestic of all earthly scenes, and worshiping God in the very beauty of holiness, let each soul drink more freely the water of life and sing again the glad acclaim:

"Oh wondrous love, to bleed and die,
To bear the cross and shame,
That guilty sinners, such as I,
Might plead thy precious name."

Merry Christmas, Every One!

H. D.

In the rush of the merry morning,
When the red burns through the gray,
And the wintry world lies waiting
For the glory of the day;
Then we hear a fitful rushing
Just without upon the stair,
See the white-robed phantoms coming,
Catch the gleam of sunny hair.

Are they Christmas fairies stealing
Rows of little socks to fill?
Are they angels floating hither
With their message of good will?
What sweet spells are these close weaving,
As like larks they chirp and sing?
Are these psalms of peace from heaven
That these lovely spirits bring?

Rosy feet upon the threshold,
Eager faces peeping through,
With the first red ray of sunshine,
Chanting cherubs come in view;
Mistletoe and gleaming holly,
Symbols of a blessed day,
In their chubby hands they carry,
Streaming all along the way.

Well we know them, never weary
Of this innocent surprise;
Waiting, watching, listening always,
With full hearts and tender eyes;
While our little household angels,
White and golden in the sun,
Greet us with the sweet old welcome,
"Merry Christmas, every one!"

The Lost Emigrants.

BY R. H. JOHNSON.

CHAPTER IV.

The storm had blown itself out at last. he clouds were lifting and the sea was alming. But the terrible strain had been oo much for my poor father. His life was owly, surely ebbing away.

The ship was now steady and he lay in eaceful repose. Presently he awoke and egged me to read. Ah, why is there ut one book in the hour of dying? I read he 23d and 103d psalms, the parting words nd prayer of the Savior in the upper oom, the 21st chapter of Revelation and a art of the one following, closing with the eautiful words: "And they shall see his ace and his name shall be in their fore-eads. And there shall be no night there: nd they shall need no candle, neither ght of the sun, for the Lord God giveth nem light, and they shall reign forever nd ever."

Lifting my eyes, I fixed them on my ather. His voyage of storm and darkness vas over. To him there was no more sea. The stormy waves that bore him away from uman eyes had in peaceful serenity vafted their precious cargo to the golden ands of the eternal shore.

The kind sympathy of Christian hearts nd their ministry of love in my great rief I shall never forget. Nor shall I ver forget the scene when, standing on he now steady deck, the solemn service for he dead at sea was read, and the body, ereft of its great soul, was committed to he deep, until the sea shall give up its lead.

I afterwards learned that the storm, that ad practically made us a dismantled wreck, vas of five days' duration, and that it had lown us in a northwesterly direction for everal hundred miles. To the inexperienced eyes of the passengers we seemed in an utterly helpless condition. Of our tall, shapely masts there remained only shattered stumps.

Our staunch, new vessel was strained and leaking, our sails torn or blown from the bolt ropes. I confess to a sinking of the heart when I came on deck and saw the devastation wrought on every hand.

And I was not alone, for the passengers generally were infected with gloomy forebodings. Not so, however, with Captain Wolcott. He was the same bluff, cheery, hopeful sea king that he had been under topgallant masts and a cloud of canvas and with serene skies.

He came among us crying: "Cheer up, cheer up, shipmates! You're in the doldrons. I'd a thousand times rather feel this deck under my feet than to be tossing in an open boat on these seas, and some one dying every day from hunger and thirst and exposure. Things look bad enough I admit, but they'll look a great deal better to-morrow."

Prof. Fergus, an experienced traveler, aided the captain materially in restoring a more hopeful feeling. This he did in two ways: by his cheerful words and the amusement—always a relief to pent-up feelings—occasioned by his ludicrous attire, for he appeared on deck wearing one boot and one slipper, with the lower button of the vest conscientiously buttoned into the third buttonhole, and with his wife's black stocking adjusted to his collar for a necktie! His poor wife had evidently been absent when he made his toilet.

Under the captain's direction the crew rapidly brought the semblance of order from chaos. Jurymasts were rigged from spars, sails were spread, and the good ship, obedient to her helm, turned her prow and slowly moved to the north. "We'll make Pitcaren's," said the captain, "or some island of the archipelago that lies a few hundred miles to the north of us. There we can repair our ship and get supplies, and then make sail for San Francisco."

And so, with newly kindled hopes, we sailed toward the North Star, but we soon found that our situation at best was bad enough. What were our short spars and few sails to the tall masts and immense area of canvas under which we had sailed? Moreover, the ominous throbbing of the pumps at intervals, by day and by night, told us that the thin planks between us and the sea's depths were shivered by the fury of the waves.

With favoring breezes matters might have been more encouraging. On the contrary, we were buffeted and carried hither and yonder by adverse winds and tempests. After several days—I cannot be more definite—we were startled early one morning by the cry of land. All eagerly rushed on deck, and sure enough, we could discern something like a castle rising from the sea off our port bow.

The captain decided it to be probably a mountain peak on an uninhabited island, far away from the lines of ocean travel.

In hopes of a fresh water supply, as also food, and of material to repair our ship, we made for the object, hoping for a secure harbor before the coming of a storm whose approach was portended by the falling barometer.

After some hours we were near enough to make out the outlines of a small island with a singular castellated peak rising in the southern part, and we could discern a little cove on the eastern side, protected by a small island lying a half mile out from the main one.

Taking in the situation, Captain Wolcott determined to make for the cove; but a stiff southerly wind was blowing, and a heavy sea was running between the islands, and despite every effort our crippled and unwieldy ship was carried beyond the mouth of the cove and between the islands, where we struck heavily, and by each succeeding wave were driven further on the bar.

Fortunately, the storm was soon over and the sea went down. Here was a predicament. With good weather the ship might possibly be lightened of its load and got back into deep water; otherwise, she must go to pieces in the first severe storm. It was a relief to know that under any conditions the sailors at the pumps could be released, as our leaky ship could not sink, having been lifted up by the waves and firmly planted on even keel on the ledge.

Night had fallen and it was determined to remain on board till morning, then to begin the removal of everything of value to the land.

At high tide we would attempt to get the empty vessel off the bar into deep water. In case of failure, we decided to remove the ship, piece by piece, as material out of which to construct another.

With the early morning the unloading began. It was a slow process. The distance to a landing in the cove was near a half mile and the boats were small. However, by diligence much was accomplished.

Tents were extemporized on shore from sails for most of the passengers and crew, but it was decided that for the present the ship was the more comfortable home for the women and children.

The captain promised to keep a diligent watch upon the weather indications, and to have boats and their crews returned to the ship every night, to be prepared for any emergency.

The Kingdom of the Child.

There's a light of Love to-day,
Falling on the world's highway,
Lilt of song and flow of mirth,
Glow of Star and thrill of Birth,
Just as when to Bethelehem Town
Came the holy Christ-child down,
And o'er wars and tumults wild
Rose the Kingdom of the Child.

Throng of angels in the sky,
Wondrous music floating nigh,
Cherubim and seraphim
Teaching earth its Christmas hymn!
Simple shepherds hushed to hear;
Eastern sages drawing near;
Rosy clouds of dawning piled
Round the chariot of the Child.

O'er the manger stood the Star,
Slipped from heaven through gates ajar;
Lowly on a couch of hay
Lay the God who took our clay.
Brooded by sweet breath of kine,
Small and fair and all-divine—
Little lovely child to be
King o'er earth's great family,
Thus, in Thee, the undefiled,
Dawned the long rule of the Child.

There a Mother Maiden pale
As a snowdrop, white and frail,
In her eyes such sacred thought
As Life's Angel pale had wrought,
Bent above her Infant sweet,
Kissed the dimples in His feet.
In that place, serene and mild,
Born the Kingdom of the Child.

Wide and large that Kingdom spreads,
Wheresover golden heads
Cluster round Kris Kringle's tree,
Grave with awe and mystery.
Still God's Angels find the way
To our earth on Christmas day:
Still the seeker and the sought
Each to each are safely brought,
And—a truce to passions wild—
Here's the Kingdom of the Child.

Tiny, crumpled baby's hand,
Strong to lead us and command.
Lady, Mother, full of grace,
Queen and cradler of the race,
Cherubim and seraphim,
Fill your cup and sing your hymn,
"Gloria in Exelsis!" Hear
How it echoes, far and near,
"Peace on earth good will to men!"
Angel chorus, uttered when Unto lowly Bethlehem Town
Came the blessed Christ child down,
And o'er wars and tumults wild
Rose the Kingdom of the Child.

Armor-Plated Boys.

It is important these days that there shall be armor plated boys. A boy needs to be iron-clad on—

His lips against the first taste of liquor.

His ears against impure words.

His hands against wrong-doing.

His heart against going with bad company.

His eyes against dangerous books and pictures, and other alluring temptations.

His pocket against dishonest money-making.

His tongue against evil-speaking.

The Christian armor on her people gives more security to the nation than all the armor-plates that are on her ships.

"Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord." Such a people will remember the Golden Rule, and such a nation will have peace. The Golden Rule is the law of God, and the psalmist says, "Great peace have they which love thy law; and nothing shall offend them." Jesus Christ is the great Peace Commissioner, as also the great Rock of Security. The Christian armor is more than a plating; it is an in dwelling principle, proof against the on slaught of the evil one.—The Helping Hand

A REMARKABLE INVENTION
BY AN OHIOAN.

A genius of Cincinnati, Ohio, has placed on the market a new Bath Cabinet that is of great interest to every man, woman and child.

This Cabinet is a rubber-walled room, an air-tight enclosure, in which one comfortably rests on a chair, and, with only the head outside, enjoys all the cleansing, curative, beautifying and invigorating effects of the most luxurious Turkish Bath, Hot-Vapor or Medicated Bath at home for three cents each, with no possibility of taking cold or in any way weakening the system.

THESE ARE THE BEST OF ALL BATHS, far superior to soap and water; celebrated for producing glowing faces, fair skin, bright eyes, elastic figures and perfect health to all men and women who make them a weekly habit, and this invention brings them within the reach of the poorest person in the country.

Clouds of hot vapor or medicated vapor surround the entire body, opening the millions of sweat pores, causing profuse perspiration, drawing out of the system all the impure salts, acids and poisonous matter of the blood which, if retained, overwork the heart, kidneys, lungs and skin, causing colds, fevers, disease, debility and sluggishness.

Astonishing is the improvement in health, feelings and complexion by the use of this Cabinet, and it seems to us that the long sought-for method of securing a clear skin, a good complexion, of retaining good health, curing and preventing disease without drugs, has certainly been found.

The makers inform the writer that more than 72,386 of these Cabinets have been sold since August, and showed letters from thousands of users who speak of this Cabinet as giving perfect satisfaction.

Since this invention Bath Tubs have been discarded, for it gives a better bath for all cleansing purposes than soap and water, and, as there are millions of homes without bathing facilities, this would be a good article to get the agency for, as millions will certainly be sold.

All our readers should have one of these Cabinets in their home. The makers agree to send it on thirty days' trial and refund the money paid for it if not just as represented

Thousands of remarkable letters have been written the inventors, and to our knowledge persons who were full of drugs and nostrums and had been given up to die were restored to robust health, to the astonishment of their friends and physicians.

Dr. E. M. S. Marble, No. 1433 R I. Avenue, Washington, D. C., says: "This Cabinet is the best of all, and the only one I could recommend. It should be in use in every home"

Dr. E. L. Easton, of Topeka, gave up his practice, for he said he could do more good for humanity with this Cabinet than his medicine, and has already sold several hundreds of them.

Congressman John J. Lentz, Mrs. Senat Douglas, Rev. James Thoms, Ph. D, past of First Baptist Church, Centerville, Mich Rev. R. E. Peale, Una, S. C.; John Brown, editor of Christian Guide; James I Hamlin, editor of the Christian Advocate, a a host of our most eminent people use a recommend it.

John A. Hagan, Richfield, Mo., afflict fifteen years with rheumatism in its wo form, was cured in six days. Mrs Anna Woo rum, Thurman, Ia., suffered for sixteen yea with Nervous Prostration, Headaches, I digestion, Kidney Trouble and Female Ill The best doctors were unable to benefit he This Cabinet cured her in four weeks, and s says it is a God-sent blessing to every woma

Mr. L. B. Westbrook, Newton, Ia., afflic ed forty-five years, was cured in three wee of Catarrh, Asthma, Heart and Kidn Troubles. O. P Freeman, Sparta, O., afflic ed seventeen years, unable to walk, was cur of Kidney Troubles, Piles and Rheumatis Thousands of others write, praising th Cabinet.

This invention is known as the "New 19 Style Square Quaker Folding Bath Cabinet. We find it to be a genuine Cabinet, with a re door; opens wide; handsomely and durab made of the best materials, rubber-lined; h a strong, rigid steel frame; top curtains open for cooling off; in fact, all the latest in provements, and should certainly last a lif time.

It folds flat in 1-inch space when not in us can be easily carried; weighs but 10 pounds.

IT IS IMPORTANT TO KNOW

That the makers guarantee results and asse positively (as do thousands of users) that th Cabinet will clear the skin, purify and enric the blood, cure nervousness, weakness, th "tired feeling," and the worst forms Rheumatism. They offer $50.00 reward for case not relieved. Cures Women's Trouble Malaria, Sleeplessness, Gout, Sciatica, Head aches, Piles, Dropsy, Liver, Kidney an Nervous Troubles.

It cures the worst Cold in one night, an breaks up all symptoms of La Grippe, Fever Pneumonia, Bronchitis, Tonsilitis, and is rea ly necessity, a household a blessing to ever family.

To please the ladies, a Head and Fac Steaming Attachment is furnished if desired which clears the skin, beautifies the comple ion, removes pimples, blackheads, eruption and is a sure cure for skin diseases, Catar and Asthma.

ALL OUR READERS SHOULD

Have one of these remarkble Cabinets. Th price is wonderfully low, only $5.00 fo Cabinet complete, with heater, formulas an directions. Head Steamer, $1 00 extra, and is indeed difficult to imagine where one ca invest that amount of money in anything els that guarantees so much genuine health.

Write to day, to the World Mfg. Co., 93 World Building, Cincinnati, O., who are th only makers, for full information; or, bette still, order a Cabinet. You won't be disap pointed, as the makers guarantee ever Cabinet, and will refund your money, after 3 days' use, if not just as represented. W know them to be perfectly reliable, capita $100,000 00, and to ship promptly upon receip of your remittance.

Don't fail to send for a booklet, anyway.

This Cabinet is a wonderful seller for agents and the firm offers splendid inducements t both men and women upon r quest, and to ou knowledge many are making from $100 to $15 per month and expenses. This is certainly a opportunity not to be neglected.

With The Children.

The Red Box Clew—XI.

fter the ugly old woman had passed of sight, Frank hurried away from the , tightly clutching the red box which been given her. She concluded to take the summerhouse for examination; she would be unseen. So she seated elf on the rustic bench and unscrewed top of the box. Was she about to n the secret of her parentage? Would find that Mrs. Dew was her mother? vould it be this repulsive creature who d herself Nance? After the top of the was loose the child sat some time, ing to look within, while all the time blood tingled in a manner most un- sant. But when she saw Vega come of the distant house she hastened to rove her opportunity, fearing the deaf might come through the pasture. The ents of the box was disappointing. re was just a piece of soiled paper ed up like a note. Frank unfolded it read with some difficulty:

er own loving mother—that disreput- old woman with the twitching nose cruel black eyes! Frank did not be- e it. Yet this Nance evidently knew ut her infancy; if not her mother, btless she knew who was. Possibly nce had stolen her from her home. But he had done so, what could be her ob- in leaving her on a stranger's step? d if Frank was in reality Mrs. Dew's ld, and Nance had stolen her away, uld the wicked woman venture this near enemy? But Mrs. Dew had expressly lared that it was a man who had taken n her little one; and not only a man, a Christian. Would she go to the vered Bridge at four o'clock Tuesday rning? No, indeed! Let the woman do worst. What a strange mystery, and in the very midst of it! Frank's head an to ache uneasily. She tore the note o little bits and threw it from her; and flung the box into the brook. As it shed in the water she remembered that nce had said it was a charm. For an ant she felt a presentiment that she uld have kept it. Then she began to violently. She had screwed the top to box after taking out the note. The floated out of sight. Frank had never so unhappy. She would go at once to . Dew and tell her everything.

he arose with a flushed face and was tled to find Vega standing in the door. y," said the deaf girl in her loud, rasp- tones, "once Ronald made me mad and uld'nt eat anything for four days—not one bit! And once Clara did me mean, and I didn't speak to her for seventeen days."

Frank saw that Vega was provided with a new slate, but she did not think of anything to answer to these remarks. "Say," said Vega, "you made me mad, but I sort of like you, you know. So you just say you're sorry you told on me and I'll forgive you right now." Frank took the slate and wrote very slowly, for this was a hard task. Vega watched each word as it was formed. "I am so sorry it happened, dear Vega; so sorry! I hope you will be friehds with me again. But I promised your mother to tell, and I had to."

Vega looked her straight in the eyes. "Then you don't mean to apologize?" she demanded.

Frank wrote: "Vega, I am very unhappy. I am in great trouble. I need your kindness."

Vega read this with unmeasured scorn. "You unhappy! What do you know about being unhappy? I guess if you sat up day after day for years, and never heard a word of what was going on about you—nor never heard a sound of music when you love music like I do—and never heard the birds or the breeze or the train or the waterfall, or anything. Pshaw! You answer my question; are you going to ap[illegible]?"

Frank wrote, and this time she was slower than ever. "I must always tell the truth, Vega, whatever happens to me. I promised your mother to tell if you climbed over the railing. If my promises were just words my friendship and love would be just words. But when a person always speaks the truth his words mean something every time."

"Pshaw!" cried Vega. "Who always tells the truth? May be Ronald, but he's a boy and don't care."

"Why, Vega! You forget your mother."

"Don't you believe it! She tells 'em! Everybody does. You told on me because you wanted to see me bounced. So you won't apologize? Well, come on, anyway; let's go take a walk."

Frank followed her, knowing Vega's enmity was still active. There was an active demonstration of this not long after. As they passed along the bank where the water was deepest, Vega gave her a sudden push. Frank was thrown over the bank and fell head-first into the water. It was only a little over knee-deep, but before Frank got her head out into the air she was almost strangled. She rested on her knees in the channel till she had cleared away her hair and regained her breath. Then she rose to her feet. Vega was standing on the bank laughing shrilly. "I thought you liked to wade," she cried.

"Oh, my dress!" wailed Frank. "It is ruined!" She tried to clamber up the bank, but Vega pushed her back. "You stay in there!" she cried. "I'm going to keep you in there as long as I want to!" Frank, shivering with the cold, started down the stream, but Vega kept abreast of her, laughing in a spiteful voice. Frank could not run fast in the water, and at last she stood helplessly looking at her tormentor. There was no use to plead with her, since Vega could not hear a word, so Frank simply waited. Vega danced up and down the bank laughing and pointing at the sorry spectacle. But Vega was having too good a time, and the fates that try to balance up our fun and misery decided to even up things for the merry child. So, as she was capering along the margin her foot slipped and down she fell into the stream, just at Frank's feet. She did not have the good luck to fall with her head into the water. Instead her head struck a rock and she was stunned. When her feeling of dazed stupefaction passed away and she ceased seeing "stars," she found that Frank had dragged her out upon the grass. That was not all, either, for Frank was washing the wounded place with water brought soaked up in her handkerchief. And just as the last shooting star vanished from Vega's astonished vision, she was even more astonished by a new thing that happened. For Frank kissed her. Vega opened her eyes in quick surprise. Then she closed them and lay very still, thinking about it. Frank lifted her head upon her knee and stroked the dripping hair; stroked it just as if she liked to do it! Which was strange also. Vega opened her eyes again and sat up and put her hand to her head feeling queer. Frank helped her to her feet, and they stood there shivering and dripping, but with faces on which deep emotion was written. It had been such a deep joy to Frank to show Vega a kindness after the other's cruelty; and it was so wonderful to Vega that Frank had not rejoiced in her well-deserved punishment. Frank reached timidly for the slate, and Vega, noting the gesture, held it out eagerly, anxious to know what the other would say to her; but sure, from Frank's eyes, that it would be something to hear. But the slate was so wet it would not show a single mark of the pencil. Frank tried to dry it on her dress, but of course, her dress was just as wet, and she laughed in the way people sometimes laugh who are very much in earnest. Vega did not laugh, because she remembered why Frank's dress had become wet, and she was sorry. "Oh, I wish I could hear what you want to tell me!" cried Vega despairingly, and her voice was not harsh, but broken in musical breaths of strong emotion. "What is it, Frank? Your eyes are like stars!" And Frank opened her arms and looked what the other could not hear. Vega ran into the embrace with a sob. Which was better than a slate and pencil.

THE continual breaking of lamp-chimneys costs a good deal in the course of a year.

Get Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass." You will have no more trouble with breaking from heat. You will have clear glass instead of misty; fine instead of rough; right shape instead of wrong; and uniform, one the same as another.

Our "Index" describes all lamps and their proper chimneys. With it you can always order the right size and shape of chimney for any lamp. We mail it FREE to any one who writes for it.

THE CHILD PROPHECY OF ISAIAH.*

The return of the Christmas season brings to mind, not only the actual fact of the coming of the Savior into the world, as that fact is recorded in the Gospels, but as well brings to mind the foreshadowings of his advent in the prophetic books of the Old Testament. Those foreshadowings appear not so much in particular and isolated statements of the prophets as in that steadily unfolding vision of the coming of the expected kingdom of God, which is the central theme of prophecy. The hope that in the future the life of Israel would come to its true fruition was the note constantly struck by the holy men of the past. They knew that Israel was the nation chosen of God to mediate his disclosure of redemptive ministries to the world, and as such its history and its destiny were sacred themes. They saw that the conditions in which they moved were not fitted to bring forth the disclosure of God's power for which the world waited, but they hoped for the purging of the nation from sin and its preparation to become, in a true sense, the channel of revelation to the world. This perfect revelation could only come at the end of the process of preparation, and so the prophets looked ever forward until the time when events should be so shaped that the purposes of God could manifest themselves in a Messianic time of peace and righteousness. At first this Messianic time was not so much associated with the coming of one particular person, but rather with a general prevalence of the divine will in the hearts of the people and the realization of the divine purpose. But as time went forward the conception of the kingdom of God was widened and deepened, and the insufficiency of the nation or even of its best part to realize the purposes of God was felt. There grew, therefore, in the mind of the prophets as the vision of the future became more clear, the figure of a Messianic person, one who was to mediate the arrival of that time of blessedness for which Israel prayed. In Isaiah this hope comes to its first full expression; but it is not so much a hope for the distant future as for a crisis then at hand. The prophet foresaw with clearness the advent of the Messianic king, but the time of his arrival and the method of his work were not so clear. The prophets themselves could only speak one message at a time. They saw but dimly into the meaning of those great mysteries of which they spoke. It is not strange, therefore, that Isaiah should regard the coming of the Messianic king as near at hand in his own time and as the divine method of relieving Israel from the distressing situation in which it found itself in his own time.

The Assyrian king, Tiglath-Pileser III., who reigned 745 to 727 B. C., was invited by King Ahaz, of Judah, to invade Palestine and cripple the armies of Pekah, of Samaria, and Rezon, of Damascus, the two kings who had leagued themselves against Jerusalem. The campaign of Tiglath-Pileser was so sucsessful that Damascus was taken and the northern kingdom of Israel was ravished; but when the mission for which Ahaz had hired the Assyrian had been accomplished the conqueror was not satisfied with his trophies, but turned his columns southward and menaced Judah itself. The people of Jerusalem heard with apprehension the news of this movement and every heart was shaken with terror. Isaiah was the only man in the city who preserved his calmness and confidence. He knew that the Assyrians would come to Jerusalem sooner or later, but not then, and he sought, therefore, to reassure his countrymen in the present emergency. That the conqueror would be turned back, that he would be prevented from invading the southern kingdom by some means, Isaiah was confident. What could be more surely hoped than that such a terrible crisis as this, if met and turned away, was to be accomplished by the advent of the Messianic king himself? Seeing with clearness and certainty that such a deliverer was to be granted to Judah, it was not difficult for him to identify the arrival of this great helper with the means of averting the present calamity.

It is to this situation that the words of our lesson address themselves. Preaching in the streets of Jerusalem to a panic-stricken people, he assures them that though the northern territories are now in anguish, yet the time is coming soon when they will no longer suffer. So confident is the prophet of this fact that he speaks as though it had already been accomplished and as though the present gloom in the north was a matter of the distant past. This is frequently the note of confident and victorious assurance in prophetic speech. That land of Zebulun and Naphtali, that Galilee of the nations, the highway of the commerce between the East and the West, would yet see the light of deliverance in such fashion that the present sorrow would be forgotten. The joy of the people in their deliverance could only be described as that produced by the two events in the life of a primitive people which called forth the most unbounded feelings of satisfaction—the one, the gathering of the harvests and the fruits in the autumn; the other, the distributing of spoil after victory. The oppressive burden of the taskmaster that now rested heavily upon these northern tribes would be broken, as when Gideon smote the strength of the Midianites in the days of old, and the armor of these Assyrian warriors, with their bloody garments stripped from their corpses, should be burned in one great conflagration.

But who could bring to pass such a deliverance? No warrior who was then living in Judah. The king himself was a weak and inefficient ruler. There was no prince of the blood who could take the leadership of Judah's armies. Nor was this necessary. God would raise up a mighty prince; a child who should be born should assume the government and with more than human strength and sagacity would bring victory to the disheartened nation. None but the most godlike names could describe his character. He would be a wonderful Counselor; he would be a mighty Hero. But more than this—he should be the eternal Father of his people, the Prince of peace. His kingdom should be a far-stretching land and his dominion upon the throne of David should last forever. The word of Jehovah was pledged to perform this.

In such confident words does Isaiah predict the downfall of the Assyrian with the advent of the Messianic king. The Assyrian indeed was overthrown or soon departed from the land, leaving the nation to recover from its distress. Other invasions came in subsequent days, and at last the nation itself was carried into captivity by the Babylonians, the successors of these same Assyrians. And yet the prediction of Isaiah had come true: that by the interposition of the divine will the enemies of Israel had been driven away. Still, no king arose in that age with the qualities which the prophet here describes. Certainly Hezekiah, great and good as he was, never rose to the level of these wonderful qualities, nor did any other king arise in the succession of Judah's monarchs who could meet the terms of this great prophecy. It was only in the coming of him who in the fullness of time was born of the seed of David according to the flesh and declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead, that were met all the requirements of this great prediction. Isaiah had seen with clearness the fact of his arrival; the time and manner he did not see. To him there was no crisis of the nation's life which more imperatively demanded the pr ence of such a ruler than the one in which stood. His confidence lifted agaid the he of Jerusalem, and the divine purpose protec the city, while the hope of the Messianic k still glowed in the bosom of the nation. I this singular quality in the Messianic h which gave it abiding interest in the heart the people. Though deferred from time time until sometimes even the faithful w perplexed and well-nigh despairing, still it never abandoned, but rather grew brighter the days passed on.

That these words of the prophet, though a dressed to a situation in his own time, f their fulfillment and true meaning in the co ing of our Lord, centuries later, there can no question. Herein is found one of the gr elements of the Messianic prophecies that lifted before the nation the certainty of a co ing period of righteousness and deliveran mediated by the arrival of one who should ha all the qualities of the greatest kings of t past with the superadded elements of divi strength and wisdom. That Jesus appeared so lowly a garb and under such widely differe circumstances was one of the reasons why t Jewish people failed to understand that he w the coming Messiah. They had so fixed th hearts upon the idea of the kingship as ass ciated with the Messianic hope that they co not understand the application of those oth prophecies concerning the suffering serva who took upon himself the sin of the worl Yet, both descriptions of the Messianic pers were true and find their unity in the minis of the Savior.

Thus, the Christmas story links together t prophecy of the child-king and the realit the child of Bethlehem in indissoluble unit and all the hopes of the prophets and sages the past were more than realized in the comi of him who though but a helpless child was tended by heavenly ministries and through life devoted to the redemption of men we about doing good, giving himself continuous in a sacrificial life, which came to its prop culmination in the cross, that he might brin not only to his own people, but to the wh world, a deliverance far surpassing that whi was associated in the prophet's mind wi h t advent of the wonderful child king who w yet to come. This is only to say that the rea ity always far surpasses the exp ctation. G is ever ready to fulfill beyond measure his pro ises of help, and this the Christian of every a has found in the abiding and enlarging realiz tions of the gospel of Christ.

BETHANY C. E. READING COURSES.

The Hebrew Prophets.

By J. Z. Tyler, Director.

In introducing the study of the prophets into the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses, we enter upon one of the most important features of Bible study, and are led, at the same time, into one of the most unfamiliar sections in the whole field of revelation. Comparatively few persons make a systematic study of the prophets and prophetic literature of the Old Testament. And yet, the situation and messages of these men are of far greater moment than the ministrations of priests and the reigns of kings. They were messengers of God and interpreters of the divine will. They spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.

Nor was their chief function the disclosure of the future. They did predict; their divine commission is confirmed by fulfillment. But a careful study of their messages shows that prediction was not their chief function. They were men of the present. They dealt with present apostasies, present sins, the present situation, present duties and obligations. They were intensely alive to their surroundings. They had the spirit of genuine reformers. They dealt also with the past. Some of them were annalists and historians, bringing to the minds of their contemporaries the story of God's dealings with his people in the past, thus furnishing light and motive for the life of the present. They were also expounders of the divine law. They laid chief emphasis upon is ethical and spiritual elements, differing in this from the priestly type of interpreters. They were preachers of righteousness, personal and national, rather than advocates of religious and sacred ceremonies. Their divine gift gave them spiritual penetration, as well as special foresight, and marked them as special messengers of God. Such, in brief, were the prophets of Israel.

In order to understand them we must know something of their times. We must view them in the midst of their surroundings in order that we may appreciate the real meanings of their messages. We should know something of their personal peculiarities, their individual characteristics. They were not all exactly alike, nor did they all play upon the same string. While each has his characteristic note, these all blend into perfect harmony under the guidance of the one inspiring Spirit.

We should know something, also, of the immense stretch of time over which the line of prophets reaches. It is almost five hundred years from Moses to Samuel, and nearly two hundred years from Samuel to Elijah. While it is impossible to give the exact date of each prophet, the following dates are sufficiently accurate to indicate their chronological distribution: Moses, 1,500 B. C.; Samuel, 1,050; Elijah, 875; Elisha, 850; Jonah, 770; Amos, 760: Hosea, 740; Isaiah, 725; Micah, 715; Nahum, 660; Zephaniah, 640; Habakkuk, 610; Jeremiah, 600; Obadiah, 586; Ezekiel, 585; Daniel, 550; Haggai, 525; Zachariah, 525; Malachi, 475; Joel, 400 (?). Thus it appears that from Moses to the last of the Old Testament prophets there is a period, approximately, of 1,100 years.

It seems that an unbroken line of prophets, varying in degree of inspiration and influence, extends from Samuel (who was judge, reformer and founder of the prophetic order) down to the very close of the Old Testament canon. Of the multitude of these, we have but limited literary remains. Yet, this portion of Old Testament literature is the richest in its ethical elements, its spiritual conceptions, its disclosures of God, its light upon life, its rebuke of sin, its call to reformation and its hopeful outlook upon the future.

I feel justified in claiming that no part of the Old Testament has so fitting and potent a message for the present as may be found in its prophetic literature.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE BOOKS; or, The Literary Structure and Spiritual Interpretation of the Books of the New Testament: A Work of Collaboration. By Herbert L. Willett and James M Campbell. Published by Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago.

The "Preacher" complains, "Of making many books there is no end." One wonders what he would say if he lived in our times. Surely, there is no end of books. Still, everything turns upon the end for which the book is made. If the author's aim is "instruction in righteousness," and if he is spiritually "furnished," his writings cannot be a failure. The aim of the authors of The Teachings of The Books is, to use their own words, "to get through the letter of Scripture to the spirit, through the shell to the kernel, through the bone to the marrow."—Preface. The book is not an ordinary introduction to the New Testament. It is an introduction, but what is better, it is more; and it is just this more that characterizes it and that shall justify its existence. Its distinguishing feature is the examination of the New Testament books severally with a desire to get hold of the essential "spiritual teachings" of each. To this end special attention is given to the study of the New Testament as literature. Herein is the division of labor in this "work of collaboration:" Prof. Willett confines attention to the literary structure, and Dr. Campbell to the spiritual teachings of the books of the New Testament.

Special study is given to these writings as literature. The light of the past and the present, of sacred and profane learning and of conservative and progressive scholarship is turned full glare upon each book. Prof. Willett's is the minor part of the book quantitatively, but it is not a whit behind the best qualitatively. His aim is to so handle the literary material as to get at the spiritual facts; and his work is so well done that his introductions are models. His treatment is so fair as to satisfy the most conservative and, at the same time, so up-to-date as to please the most progressive, whose sole desire is constructive knowledge. While these introductions are necessarily brief they are packed with what is known, and what is suppositional is left to one side. One might read learned volumes and not get more real and positive knowledgn than is here found. This busy age owes Prof. Willett a debt of gratitude, for he has put the best within the reach of the busiest.

But the important and predominating feature of the book is the "Spiritual Teachings," by Dr. Campbell. For the literary study is in order to this spiritual apprehension. Spiritual instruction is the end of all devout study of the Scriptures. The things of God are spiritual and are spiritually discerned. It is in this part of the book that the more and better than mere introduction appears. This is in the best sense biblical and practical theology. The teaching is spiritual; that is, it is "interpreting spiritual things to spiritual men." Not the semi-fanatical "spiritual" of such pious phrases as "spiritual meeting" and "spiritual talk." The author is in such sympathy with the biblical writers that he grasps what is at once truest, deepest and best in each book. He does not disappoint by saying too little about what is great, nor weary by saying too much about what is small. His treatment of the Epistles to the Thessalonians and the Revelation are alone worth the price of the book many times told. Eschatology has been such a fruitful source of vagaries that the sober student can but hail this interpretation of these books. John's vision has been the occasion of so many visionary theories that it is almost impossible to get a clear vision of the Apocalypse; and Paul's "man of sin" has occasioned many sins of exposition. Dr. Campbell's "spiritual teachings" helping us to see with John and to hear with the Thessalonians makes enlightenment for the one and atonement for the other possible. Samples of these "spiritual teachings" can but commend the book, but space only permits a partial outline of one book—Ephesians. "The union of the believer with the body of Christ forms the basis of a Christian socialism. The church is the nucleus of that new social order which lies at the end of Christ's redemptive effort, and is also the means of its realization." Outline:

"1. Development of the idea of the organic nature of Christianity."

"2. Ways in which the unity in Christ of redeemed humanity may be promoted." (This developed.)

"(1) By keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

"(2) By maintaining the unity of the faith.

"(3) By putting the life of the individual into the life of the church.

"(4) By working for the same ends.

"(5) By cultivating the graces that make for social unity.

(6) By the performance of reciprocal duties.

(7) By uniting forces in a common warfare. . . . "

The authors are very modest. "This handbook has been prepared especially for advance Bible class work, but it is hoped that it may be found useful to pastors."—Preface. It must be helpful to every pastor who desires to "preach the Word." It will help satisfy and give an impulse to the modern demand for biblical preaching. It ought to make every preacher an Apollos—"Mighty in the Scriptures." The language of Bunyan's friends is applicable here: "John print it," "let him live," "it might do good." E. A. ORR.

The Treasury of Religious Thought for December, 1899, contains sermons and outlines of sermons by the Rev. Daniel H. Overton, Dr. David Gregg, President C. C. Hall, Dr. Lyman Abbott, Dr. Howard Duffield and the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of London, besides a Christmas sermon, in his own vein, by Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage. The first sermon introduces a new contributor to the Treasury, Rev. D. H. Overton, whose portrait is the frontispiece, and whose new church in Brooklyn is pictured and described.

Everybody's Magazine for December maintains the spirit and excellence of the preceding numbers of this newcomer in the field of popular literature. The articles and stories are well illustrated as well as interesting and cannot fail to please the lovers of magazine literature. Everybody's Magazine is published by the North American Co., New York, and can be had of any newsdealer at the popular price of ten cents.

The table of contents for the Chautauquan for December presents a most inviting list of topics for a wide circle of readers. The full page illustrations do honor to the Christmas season while numerous articles on the topics of the times well and profitably occupy the attention of the student and the observer of the ways of the world.

Winter in the South.

The season approaches when one's thoughts turn toward a place where the inconveniences of a Northern winter may be escaped. No section of this country offers such ideal spots as the Gulf Coast on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad between Mobile and New Orleans. It possesses a mild climate, pure air, even temperature and facilities for hunting and fishing enjoyed by no other section. Accommodations for visitors are first-class, and can be secured at moderate prices. The L. & N. R. R. is the only line by which it can be reached in through cars from Northern cities. Through cars schedules to all points in Florida by this line are also perfect. Write for folders, etc., to GEO. B. HORNER D. P. A. St. Louis Mo.

ALLEN.

Little Ruth, daughter of B. H. and Ida Allen, died at Algonac, Mich., Oct. 13, 1899, being one year and two months old. A beautiful bud of promise taken to the glory-world in her purity. H N. ALLEN.

CARTER.

Called home, Mrs. Margaret Carter, at the age of 76 years, in Sedalia, Mo., Oct. 27, 1899. The funeral and burial w re at Waverly, the old home of the family. Sister Carter's death was one of more than ordinary interest. Her maiden name was Campbell. She was a first cousin of Alex. Campbell, and the last of 13 brothers and sisters of one branch of that sturdy Scotch Irish family who came to this country in the early part of this century from Newry, Ireland. And her history, together with that of her husband, the late Jesse W. Carter, was closely interwoven with that of the pioneer struggles and marvelous growth of the religious people known as Christians or Disciples of Christ. She cast in her lot with this people over 50 years ago, and she was "faithful until death" The memory of Bro. and Sister Carter is indeed blessed. She leaves two sons, Dr. S. W. Carter, of Marshall, and Dr. Wm. Carter, of Sedalia, both fine, active Christian men, and one daughter, Mrs. Gentry, of Sedalia, a sweet-spirited, devoted Christian lady. These and a hundred others whose lives have been made better by them are a sufficient monument of the impress of their lives on the world. And we are led to exclaim, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord . . . they rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

B T. WHARTON.

Marshall, Mo. Dec. 5, 1899.

GROVES.

Nancy A. Groves was born Dec. 25th, 1825. She was married to Shelba Starr May 9th, 1844, who preceded her to the better land in 1855. She was united in marriage to John Breenett, Feb. 10, 1858 She became a member of the Christian Church at the age of 15 and lived the true faith all her life. Five children were born to her by her first marriage and two by the second, of which the writer is the only girl. Her home was at Snider, Ill.

MARY E. MORRILL.

HAMBLIN

Mrs. Dr. Ida Hamblin was born at Garrettsville, O., April 11, 1863, and died at Geneva, O., Nov. 1, 1899, aged 36 years, four months and 20 days. She was the youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs E. W. Moss. She graduated at the Geneva Normal in the class of '80, and completed a full course at the Huron Street Medical College, Cleveland, O., in 1898. She was married to Mr. Arthur Hamblin, who died a number of years ago. She was a faithful member of the Church of Christ at Geneva, being at one time our Sunday-school superintendent. She was settled in the practice of medicine at Willoughby, O., for more than a year, and had a large practice She leaves a father, mother, brother and sister, one son and a large circle of friends to mourn their loss. But "blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." H. N. ALLEN.

PIPER.

At Hartselle, Ala , Dec. 1, the pure spirit of Norman Piper, the dutiful son of our Bro. and Sister D. R Piper, passed from earth to heaven. They have the deep sympath of all who know them. O. P. SPIEGEL.

Birmingham, Ala.

SCOTT.

George A. Scott was born in Madison, O., Oct. 16, 1876, and died in Cleveland, O , Nov 24, 1899, aged 23 years, one month and 10 days Bro. Scott was killed by the accidental discharge of a gun. He was married to Miss Lettie Keenen, Jan. 29, 1896. He was a faithful member of the church at Thompson, O. He leaves a wife, two little boys and a large circle of friends to mourn their loss.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep."

H. N. ALLEN.

STORM.

Miss Lola Maud Storm, of Maryville, Mo., departed this life Thursday morning, Nov. 23, 1899. Miss Lola was the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Storm, of Maryville. Miss Lola was 23 years of age. Her character was one of the sweetest and purest. Her life was a model of Christian living. Not only her parents, but her church and her many friends will miss her sadly. But all have the blessed hope that is in Christ our Savior.

A. W. LAWRENCE.

Maryville, Mo.

TURLEY.

Eliza J. Turley was born in Logan County, Illinois, Dec. 12, 1840: died at her home in Sangamon County, Nov. 16, 1899, aged 58 years, 11 months and four days. She was the beloved wife of Elder Henry D. Turley and mother of 13 children, of whom nine are still living. She was a devoted Christian, and was in every way faithful to the Church of Christ. She lived to see all her children unite with the church that she loved. Peacefully, quietly, triumphantly, she passed away to be "forever with the Lord" leaving behind a beautiful Christian life as an example to her children.

Your Good Health

depends upon the food you eat. Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder adds to the healthfulness of all risen flour-foods.

Not only this, it makes the food lighter, sweeter, finer-flavored and more delicious. It is worth while to exercise care in purchasing baking powder to see that you get the kind that makes the food more wholesome and at the same time more palatable.

PRICE BAKING POWDER CO., CHICAGO.

NOTE.—There are many mixtures, made in imitation of baking powder, which it is prudent to avoid. They are lower in price than cream of tartar powders, but they are made from alum, a corrosive poison, dangerous to health when used in food, and render the food unhealthful.

CHRISTMAS MESSAGES.

I have often thought of your name; "Christian," one who is loyal to Christ; "Evangelist," one who wins souls to Christ; an appropriate name, a good record, a glorious mission. May your Christmas be one of joy and thanksgiving, and may your new year be one of peace and prosperity.

JOHN L. BRANDT.

Valparaiso, Ind.

May this glad Christmas time bring joy and happiness to the editor of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST and all his colaborers, and to the many readers of this most excellent paper. "Peace on earth, good will to men."

J. T. OGLE.

Carrollton, Mo.

My heart's desire and prayer to God for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is that its editor and all its associates may ever keep it true to the Bible and to the principles and purposes of the great religious reformation of the nineteenth century, which I have always believed and still believe means a complete return to the teachings of Christ and his inspired apostles.

O. A. BARTHOLOMEW.

St. Louis, Mo.

How the Christmas time emphasizes the value of the kind, forgiving, charitable and pleasing spirit in us. The very thought of Christmas moves us to consider the happiness of people around us and to do something to increase their joys. Truly, it is more blessed to give than to receive. And yet, there are many who cannot give and whose happiness must be limited to receiving. Those well favored of the Lord should see to it that to these this only possible happiness is not denied. In a practical and substantial way let us help to increase the volume of the divine anthem of peace on earth and good will to men. T. E. CRAMBLET.

Pittsburg, Pa.

New Year's greeting to the EVANGELIST. Christmas comes to rebuke our hard selfishness. It comes to warm and cheer the heart—to enable us to enter the the portal of the new year with the large charity that belongs to the kingdom of Christ. Every issue of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST has been a Christmas number. God bless it. W. BAYARD CRAIG.

In speaking of the Mayfield Sanitarium, an advertisement of which appears on the cover of this week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, the Chicago Health Journal says:

"The numerous reports that come to our office of the splendid treatment here received and the good results accomplished were the considerations that convinced us that the institution in question coold claim the attention of a publication devoted to matters of health. Accordingly, our investigation, which left nothing to be desired in point of vigor and scrutiny, was set on foot, and the claims and record of the sanitarium above mentioned were thoroughly sifted. As a result of this inquiry we feel bound to acknowledge that among all the establishments for curing the sick that have ever been made by us the subject of examination, not one has shown a better record for accomplishments in the past or better all round equipment for restoring health and promoting strength than is to be found in the case of the Mayfield Sanitarium."

Notes of Travel.

As I have settled in this city I shall make a short note of my trip. Leaving Pratt, Kan., Nov. 4th, I attended the dedication of the new stone church at Dodge; then spent a week with friends and relatives at Lajunta, Col.; returned to Emporia and made a ten days' visit there—where I labored for six years. I found Bro. Sellers in a good meeting of a month's duration with some ten or twelve added. I found the Normal School in a flourishing condition. Prof. Iden conducts a Bible class of 200 young men every Saturday evening at the Christian Church. The brethren are much pleased with him and his work and feel like calling his class a "Bible Chair." It really deserves the name. After a few hours' stay in Kansas City I reached here Saturday evening, Nov. 18th, and was "taken in" by Bro. A. F. Holden, who has been here for a year, but is going to Colorado as soon as he can pack. He deserves to be received by the brethren wherever he goes as a noble man of God, and his wife as a true helpmeet. I have been chosen by the congregation as his successor and shall begin as such tomorrow. This seems to be an important city, nearly midway between Springfield and Memphis. We have a very good building here and a congregation of about two hundred. It was my privilege to deliver the Thanksgiving sermon at a union service to a large and appreciative audience. The outlook here is hopeful.

R. L. LOTZ.

West Plains, Mo.

Fort Wayne and Vicinity.

Lord's day, November 19, was observed by the West Jefferson Street Church with special services. The occasion was the 28th anniversary of the organization of the church. One of the features of our special service was the reading of a letter from N. J. Aylsworth who, during the closing years of his active ministry, organized the church and built the first house of worship. The letter was the rehearsal of precious memories and revealed the sacrifices which the planting of the cause in this city cost the pioneers. It was ordered spread on the minutes as a permanent record of the beginning here.

Another feature of special interest was a banquet given on the Friday evening preceding by the official board to the men of the congregation. About seventy-five men sat down together and partook of a simple meal, while speakers chosen for the purpose reviewed the several periods of the church's history. It was a unique assembly and full of good fellowship.

Bro. V. W. Dorris was present on Friday evening and remained over Lord's day. The special purpose of the occasion was the reduction of the church debt, and over $3,000 was pledged to be paid before the end of the present year. The brethren feel encouraged.

Recently, by invitation of the City Ministerial Association, the writer gave an account to that body of the Jubilee Convention, which was most cordially received. This is an indication of the impression our convention made upon people of other religious bodies.

Z. A. Harris, of the West Creighton Avenue Church, is making strenuous efforts in the city and among the churches of the district to reduce that church's indebtedness, and thereby save the property. This is a worthy enterprise and should receive the hearty support of all the churches in this section of the state.

There are a number of churches in this vicinity which have not at present any preaching at all. If they could be induced to co-operate, they together might support a good man and be made aggressive elements in their several communities.

The writer will assist in a meeting at South Bend, Ind., beginning December 4.

Bro. Van Arsdall will supply the pulpit of the West Jefferson Street Church on Lord's day during the continuance of the meeting.

LAXATIVE BROMO-QUININE TABLETS

WILL CURE A COLD IN ONE DAY

EVERY DRUGGIST FROM KLONDIKE TO CUBA

sells for colds Laxative Bromo-Quinine Tablets, and the very fact of its being the only exclusive cold remedy sold throughout this vast territory is striking evidence of its popularity and merit. Laxative Bromo-Quinine is a prescription compounded for colds and COLDS ONLY, therefore, if you have a cold it is but natural that you prefer a remedy made for this particular affliction rather than some medicine that is claimed to cure nearly "all the ills to which flesh is heir."

THE KING IS DEAD.

The King is dead! The sad Old Year,
A monarch to whose weary brow
The crown has long seemed heavy, now
Is lying on his solemn bier.
Toll, bells, the tidings far and near
Proclaim, that all may softly tread.
Toll gently, bells, the King is dead
Long live the King! The glad New Year
Ascends the throne, while from the throats
Of multitudes burst forth the notes
Of acclamation, deep and clear;
Ring out, O bells, in gladness ring:
The King is dead! Long live the King!

Good alike to Renewals or New Subscriptions.

Renew. That is, begin anew. Don't let that old date on your label stare at you for several months of 1900.

We believe we have mentioned this before, but now is the time to subscribe it is also the time to see that "the other fellow" subscribes likewise.

If our editor would only give us about one-fourth of each edition we might tell you most of the encouraging words and recount the more encouraging deeds of the friends of this journal. But alas! he is obstinate and insists that the readers have some "rights that are to be respected," even after their subscriptions have been received. Much, therefore, will be left for you to supply when we say that this has been the best December the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has experienced in many years. Will our friends and those otherwise minded please continue to advertise us?

Bro. A. P. Cobb, of Decatur, Ill., writing in reference to our club arrangement announced in our issue of Dec. 14th, says: "It will I believe be accepted by scores of churches whose spiritual leaders feel the need in every Christian family of just such an influence as is wielded by your magnificent paper. Surely, every intelligent, wide-awake pastor will at once see the immense advantage to the church, the individual member and himself, of having a CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in every family of his congregation. My best wishes and most earnest co-operation are yours in this special offer to the churches."

Bro. W. B. Harter, Clay Center, Neb., says: "You can depend on me to do what I can for the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST. I have learned to talk church papers in the pulpit and out of it. Have learned to preach a sermon once a year on Christian literature."

Dear Bro. Harter, we do wish you would start a school with a correspondence course for the benefit of some of the brethren who have not yet learned these things.

BOOK DEPARTMENT.

Alas for the family which does not appreciate the value of good books! During these long winter evenings literature of some kind is a necessity; it is only a question as to the kind of literature that will be read.

No kind of fiction has such a charm for both old and young as the historical romance—a tale written around some hero of the olden times, in which both fact and fancy are incorporated. We have recently published four such stories, the leading actor in each narrative being taken from Old Testament history. These four books are:

"Queen Esther," by M. M. Davis	$ 75
"Moses, the Man of God," by D. R. Dungan	1 00
"King Saul," by J. Breckenridge Ellis,	1 00
"In the Days of Jehu," by J. Breckenridge Ellis	75

Notice what has been said of these books by competent critics:

Of "Queen Esther": "This is the best little book I have read in ten years"—Jas. Small. "A delightful volume, of special interest to all Sunday-school workers."—Gospel Messenger. "Well written, high in tone and marked by intellectual strength and devout purpose,"—Baptist Standard. "I have read the book with great profit."—B. B. Sanders. "Buy it and read it, for it will stir your heart."—Granville Jones.

"King Saul" is thus spoken of: "So interesting is the narrative that to begin a reading is to finish it."—Gospel Advocate. "A book which we heartily commend for the family circle."—Christian Standard. "The author succeeds marvelously in vivifying Bible stories."—Christian Oracle. "It is an unqualified success."—Plattsburg Leader.

"In the Days of Jehu" is a later work by Mr. Ellis. "Moses, the Man of God," is a very recent publication. All who have read "On the Rock" (a book that has run through more than a score of editions) know that Dr. Dungan can tell a story well, and will be anxious to secure his latest work. All four of these books are beautifully bound in cloth. Sent postpaid on receipt of price.

The Christian Sunday-school Lesson Commentary stands at the head of all helps for the teacher or advanced pupil. That is what we believe. And we are not alone in that belief. Note what others say: Dr. J. C. Wasson, of San Jose, Cal., writes: "It affords me pleasure to express the lofty appreciation I have of your Lesson Commentary. It is the most complete compilation for student and teacher I have ever seen. It seems to me you have reached perfection." J. C. Frisbie, Denver, Col., says: "If the teacher wishes the best help, he will find it in the Christian Lesson Commentary." The Gospel Messenger says, editorially: "We have given an unusually close examination to the Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900, and do not hesitate to pronounce it the most satisfactory lesson commentary we have yet seen" These are unsolicited testimonials. If you have not yet secured a copy, write us at once. The book contains 400 pages, is bound in cloth; price, $1.00, or $9.00 per dozen.

Many Sunday-schools at the beginning of a new year will require new class books record books, envelopes, etc. We have a large supply of the best at reasonable rates. We will gladly send our catalogue on request. Every church worker, and especially every preacher, should have a copy of this catalogue for convenient reference.

CONCERNING SUNDAY-SCHOOL SUPPLIES.

Some idea of the magnitude of our business in Sunday-school supplies may be gained from the fact that during the past two weeks we have deposited in the St. Louis Post Office one hundred and six sacks of supplies, weighing twelve thousand seven hundred and twenty pounds, or over six tons. All of this was Sunday-school supplies; there were many more tons of copies of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and other printed matter. This was not an unusually large amount, but merely our regular business.

It sometimes happens that some of our patrons are, in one way or another, induced to send their order for Sunday-school supplies elsewhere for a change. It almost always happens, in such cases, that another change is made, and the order comes to us again, permanently. The following letter is a sample of many that we receive. It comes from Nashville, Kan.:

We had used your S. S. literature for years, but decided to try another series during 1899. Now we want to tell you that we are much better pleased with your literature. Enclosed find our order for 1900—the entire year.

In another column on this page we have quoted from some of the admirers of the Christian Lesson Commentary, by W. W. Dowling. We must give space, also, to the following bouquet from J. H. MacNeill, Muncie, Ind.:

The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1900 is by all odds the handsomest volume I have yet seen published by any company. It contains about 400 pages, and from title-page to finis is loaded with good, helpful things for the Sunday school teacher. It presents the best suggestive plan for the study of the lesson I have yet found. If carefully and intelligently followed for preparation it will thoroughly equip any teacher to properly and effectively teach the lesson. The preliminary helps, the lesson analysis, the expositions, the illustrative material, the truths to be applied, the practical lessons to be emphasized, the suggestive material provided, certainly furnish in rich abundance, all that an earnest teacher may require to make him a "workman that needeth not to be ashamed" rightly and intelligently teaching his class. Bro. Dowling, our veteran Sunday-school leader, out of his ripe experience has given us the best. The Christian Publishing Company has seconded his efforts. This Commentary deserves and I believe will command a very large sale.

"We cannot find the slightest fault with your Sunday-school supplies, and Our Young Folks, especially, we consider a necessity," writes Mrs. Bird G. Shelton, Troy, Mo. Our Young Folks is being made better and better with each year and each issue. It stands in a class all by itself as a paper for Sunday-school workers and Christian Endeavorers. Its rapidly increasing circulation shows that its worth is appreciated.

On Friday, December 22, we sent three tons of books and supplies to the St. Louis post office. This day's mail is not included in the statement made above. We do not often do any bragging, and we do not make this statement as a boast, but merely to indicate the amount of business we are doing, which is the best possible proof of the high esteem in which our publications are held by the public. Our Sunday school supplies, like our other publications, stand on their own merits. We do not think we shall find it necessary to resort to any of the—let us put it gently—questionable methods adopted by certain of our competitors to induce schools to purchase and use our supplies.

If you have postponed sending in your order for supplies, send it at once and the supplies will reach you in time for the first Sunday of the new year, provided you are not too remote from St. Louis.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Following a week crowded with disasters to the British in the Transvaal has come a week of almost unbroken silence in regard to the developments in South Africa. For four days there was not an official dispatch from the seat of the war and no one knew what might be happening to Ladysmith, Kimberley and Mafeking or to Methuen and Gatacre. In such a case as this, when the latest news told of defeat at every point, it was reasonably feared that no news might be very bad news. The messages which have been received after this period of uncertainty are only negatively reassuring. There have been no further British losses. The beleaguered towns still hold out against the Boers and the relief expeditions under Methuen, Gatacre and Buller stand checked and for the time baffled. The whole situation is one of poise and waiting. So suddenly and completely has popular confidence in General Buller been destroyed by his one defeat, that no one any longer expects him to win a decisive victory or to succeed in his project of relieving Ladysmith. The situation has come around to nearly the same point at which it was before his arrival. There is nothing to do but wait for reinforcements and nothing immediately to hope but that the besieged towns will be able to hold out until reinforcements come.

Already Lord Roberts has sailed from England, and Gen. Kitchener is on the way from Egypt, but it will necessarily be some weeks before they can be in the field at the head of new troops, and it will not be surprising if one or even all of the besieged towns should be taken before they can be relieved. Unquestionably the situation is, from the military point of view, far more desperate than it was after the British defeat at Majuba Hill. But it must be borne in mind that the favorable settlement which the Boers secured in the agreement of 1881 was not the result of Majuba Hill, but of a British ministry which did not believe in the war. The defeat at Majuba Hill was not much more than an excuse for quitting on any terms. The situation is different now. The British ministry does believe in the war. Even in her present desperate straits, it is not so much a question whether England is able to win, as whether she is willing to pay the price of victory. And it is not so much a question whether the ministry is willing to pay the price, as whether the people will continue to support that ministry and that policy when each successive defeat raises the price of victory. A defeat of Chamberlain in England would mean more for the Boers than a dozen defeats of Buller in the field.

The old year, now passing out of existence, seems determined to keep up its record of sensational events to the end. Last week witnessed a panic in the Wall Street stock market which, but for the timely assistance of Secretary Gage, might have become a national calamity. There was also reported two heavy failures in Boston, one being the Globe Bank, for over $10,000,000. It is thought, however, that the affairs of the bank are in a solvent condition and affairs on Wall Street are now comparatively quiet. The disturbance on Wall Street was, of course, attributed to British reverses in South Africa. Another event of a lamentable character last week was the burning of twelve little girls at a Catholic school in Quincy, Illinois. They were rehearsing for a Christmas entertainment, when the light clothing of one caught on fire from a candle, and a holocaust ensued. This sad event darkened many homes and was the cause of universal sorrow in that city. There were also many other events seemingly vying with each other to get into the passing year, but of which we cannot now speak.

The death of Gen. Lawton in the Philippines is a reminder that we, too, have a price to pay for the victory which is almost ours in those islands, and it is a heavy price when it includes the death of such men as Lawton. It would be difficult to name a man, either living or dead, who is more admirably typical of the best sort of American soldier. Keen, courageous, quick of eye, hard of muscle, skillful in counsel and resolute in execution, strong to endure hardships and privations, rigorous in his requirements of his men and of himself, he ruled men, not only by the authority of his military rank, but also by the higher authority of a commanding personality. Perhaps the ideal general of the future, or even of the present, is the man who shall plan campaigns and direct movements while he himself keeps safely out of range of the enemy's bullets. But Lawton was not that kind of general. He was a field leader who, like the great warriors from the siege of Troy to the age of chivalry, have led their troops in person and have shunned no danger to which the common soldier was liable. It was not an important engagement in which Lawton fell. The town of San Mateo was held by 300 insurgents. He led out a body of troops to take the place. The attack was succesful, but as the enemy evacuated Lawton, who, as usual, was in the firing line, was struck by a bullet and fell dead. No man in the Philippines was better fitted by natural endowment and long training to cope with the situation which is presented there, and his loss will be felt as would the loss, perhaps, of no other man. But it does not indicate that the situation there is more serious than had been supposed. There is still much skirmishing and guerilla fighting to be done, even though the Filipino army is scattered, Aguinaldo fleeing and his American pursuers only a day's march behind him.

The remains of the victims of the Maine disaster in Havana Harbor have been lifted from Cuban soil and transferred to America. They were conveyed by the battleship, Texas, and arrived at Newport News at eleven o'clock on Christmas day. There were one hundred and fifty-one bodies or two less than the number reported buried in Cuba. But as these could not be found it is now thought there must have been a mistake in the burial account in some way. The coffins on the Texas were enshrouded in large American flags and mammoth wreaths of artificial flowers and evergreens. The remains will be conveyed to Arlington Cemetery, where they are to be buried on Thursday of this week. Chaplain Chadwick will conduct the funeral rites upon this occasion, assisted by the chaplain of the Naval Academy. This nation does itself great honor in this act in behalf of those who thus gave their lives for its honor and perpetuity and for the liberty of an oppressed people.

One of the newest and biggest things appearing in the closing days of the old year is the proposed National Bank of the United States with our present, Secretary of the Treasury for its president, after his retirement from the Cabinet. The object in view, it is said, is to produce a bank that will be to the United States, as the Bank of England is to the British Empire. Secretary Gage has been transacting the nation's foreign business and the larger home transactions through the National City Bank of New York, and now expects to make it a depository bank for the nation's revenue for awhile, at least, at the estimated rate of about a million a day. It is now proposed, according to press reports, to unite the National City and the Hanover National Banks, both of which are said to to be controlled by the Rockefeller money trust, and to make these united banks the bank of the nation; or, perhaps, more properly speaking, to make the United States the chief customer or patron of this bank. It is to be the bank through which this nation is to transact its financial obligation. Another handsome item of the consolidated banks will be the foreign business of the Standard Oil Company, which is said to have reached $59,000,000 in eleven months of the present year. Just what demand there is for such a tremendous centralization of capital in one bank, and what its effect upon the nation and its various interests will be, can only be conjectured.

A hundred million dollars a year appears to be the present market offered to the people of the United States by Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines, provided we are able to supply the normal demand in those islands for foreign products. This estimate is based upon their actual consumption in years of normal conditions. How rapidly this will increase remains to be seen, but if the experience of the past year in Hawaii is an indication of what will happen elsewhere the increase must be very rapid. The exports from the United States to Hawaii in the ten months of 1899, whose record is now complete, are more than double those of the corresponding months of 1897 and nearly double those of the corresponding months of 1897 and nearly double those of the corresponding months of 1898, while to Cuba they promise to exceed in 1899 those of any preceding year, even surpassing that of the great reciprocity year, 1893, when the exports to that island were double the average of earlier years. More than one-half of the supplies which Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines have received from other parts of the world in former years have been furnished them by Spain, and this fact has led to the preparation by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics of a series of tables showing the exportation of principal articles from Spain to each of these islands in 1896, the latest year in which commercial conditions in those islands were at all normal.

It is a striking illustration of the unity of the world and of the close relationships, commercially, between the several nations of the earth that a British defeat in South Africa produces such fluctuation of prices and intense excitement in the stock markets of the world. Close observers of financial movements have observed with no little apprehension the effect on the stock exchange in New York and in other cities of the country of the recent British disasters in South Africa. A great many American securities, of course, are held in England in the form of stocks, and these have been thrown upon the market with a result of sending down the prices far below their previous value. Whatever people's sympathies may be in this war between the Britains and Boers, the conviction seems to be universal that the success of the Boers would mean serious financial disaster in this and other countries. The British have been reaping the results of overconfidence and an underestimate of the foe with which they have to contend. Present appearances indicate that they have learned their lesson and are taking steps to repair the damages which they have already suffered. One can but admire the calm courage with which the British have faced their defeats and the frankness with which they criticize their own shortcomings. The Boers have proven themselves, not only brave fighters, but superior strategists. One cannot resist the conviction, however, that their temporary successes will only tend to prolong the war, which can have but one termination, unless there is intervention by other European nations. There is talk of this, as there always is in such cases, but the Continental powers will think twice before they come into direct antagonism with Great Britain.

NEW YEAR'S GREETING.

The Old Year has gone into the tomb of the Past. The New rises upon our vision. It has the distinction of being the closing year of the century. It is destined to be a great year in its achievements. Mighty events are before us. Jesus Christ is beckoning His church to advance unitedly to the conflict with Wrong. A thousand trumpet-calls are voicing the mandate of the Master. In the midst of these stirring times, when "to be living is sublime," and at the dawn of the New Year, we send Christian greetings to the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and repeat the message from an ascended saint, "Quit you like men!" Thanking you for your cordial and sympathetic support in our editorial labors in the past, we confidently expect, with God's blessing and guidance, to be able to win your approval in the future. We ask all our readers to join with us in the solemn pledge to strive, during the year 1900, to do what Christ would have us do, and to be what He would have us be, looking to Him for strength to carry out the high resolve. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen!

A BACKWARD GLANCE.

With this number the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST closes another volume, as we also close the labors of another year. It is natural, and, we believe quite proper at such a time, to take at least a glance backward over the way we have come that we may gather fresh inspiration for what lies before.

The year by whose dying embers we are now sitting has not been an uneventful one. Indeed, no year can pass now without being crowded with events of far-reaching importance, so intense has our modern life become. The conclusion of our Treaty with Spain, by which Cuba was released from Spanish rule, and Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands passed under the control of the United States; the outbreak of the Tagal rebellion and the prosecution of the war by the United States forces ever since; the Peace Conference at The Hague, and the war between Great Britain and the South African Republics; the celebrated Dreyfus trial in France, during 1899, have attracted the attention of the whole world and cannot fail to make the year a memorable one in the annals of time.

These are the events which will occupy the largest amount of space in future history, no doubt, but after all; perhaps, they are not the events which in the sight of God are of chiefest value. The progress of education and enlightenment, the building and endowment of of schools, the patient training of the young, religious work at home and abroad, and the progress of moral and social reforms—these are the less notable but the more potent factors in molding the life of the world. The past year has been one of great activity along all these lines of work, and eternity alone can disclose the full results.

Looked at from a religious point of view, the world seems to grow more Christian every year. Business, social life, politics, the churches, and even theology, are being Christianized more and more every year. We feel sure that Jesus Christ never was so potent and majestic a Figure and Force in human society as he is to-day. Never has literature—and especially the higher forms of literature and art—borne more eloquent testimony to the character and power of Christ than they do to-day. The most powerful books of the immediate past are books which have dealt with the problem of Christ, and especially with the application of the principles of His life to the life of our times. Never was the conviction so prevalent as it is to-day that Christ's teaching is intended to cover the whole sphere of human life.

Each year witnesses some progress in the direction of Christian union. There is a silent growth going on in all the churches which is leading men away from the narrowness of sect to the breadth and catholicity of the church universal. It is the potent influence of Christ drawing men unto Himself. It has long ago come to be understood by thoughtful men that Christian union is not to come about by platforms, nor by noisy debates, nor by ecclesiastical pressure, but by growth into the likeness of Jesus Christ.

The year past has been one of great activity among the Disciples of Christ. The Jubilee Convention, celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the beginning of our missionary operations reached high-water mark in respect to numbers and religious enthusiasm. There has been, especially during the latter part of the year, an unusual activity of these reactionary forces which, ever and anon manifest themselves in the history of any religious people. But let no one mistake the mere temporary eddy in the s ream of our history for the majestic tide of sentiment which flows steadily on toward larger views, a better interpretation of Christian life and duty, and toward larger achievements in the kingdom of God. The great heart of the brotherhood never beat more loyally for Christ and the Holy Scriptures than it does at the present time. There is no thought of turning aside from those great principles, the advocacy and dissemination of which have given us the success to which have attained. Prominent among these truths is that liberty of opinion and of action for which our fathers contended against the tyranizing power of the creeds of their day.

In this agitation it has fallen to the lot of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST to bear a conspicuous part. We have not sought conspicuity, but we have sought simply to be loyal to what is most vital and fundamental in our great plea for the return to Christ and to unity in Him. Looking back through the year that has come and gone, whatever mistakes of judgment we may have made, we have the satisfaction of knowing that our steadfast aim has been to follow the leadership of Christ, and to do and say what He would have us do and say. We also have the consolation of believing that when the mists of the present agitation have blown away, and everything can be seen and understood in its true light, that many who have censured our course will commend it, and will come to understand that we have been passing through one of those crises in the life of a people in which their moral and spiritual fiber is tested, and out of which they emerge at last with clearer vision, with truer hearts and with arger charity to pursue their God-given mission in the world.

We cannot say the final word for the Old Year without extending heartfelt thanks to those of our friends—and their name has been legion—who have stood by as so unflinchingly in the experiences through which we have passed, and who have constantly cheered us with their words of appreciation and encouragement. Nor are we unmindful of the service rendered by those who have, in the spirit of freedom which is the glory of our movement, criticized adversely, but in the spirit of Christian kindness, the policy of the paper. These, too, are our friends. We be brethren. We love a common Master and serva common cause. Our confident hope and expectation is that, if we loyally follow the Master He will lead us to higher spiritual altitudes, where, above the mists and moral miasms of party prejudices and personal animosities, we shall see that our petty differences aro as nothing in the light of His all-enkindling Presence. Meanwhile—

"Hea t to heart we bide the shadows Till the mists have cleared away."

DWIGHT L. MOODY.

Mr. Moody, the evangelist of world-wide fame, died at his home at Northfield, Mass., at noon, Friday, December 22. A few weeks ago he was compelled to close his evangelistic work in Kansas City because of threatened heart failure, and was taken to his home. There was expressed a hope at the time that he would eventually rally from this attack, although he might not again be able to resume his public work. This hope has not been realized. He was not able to rally from the exhaustion consequent on overwork, and fell asleep in the presence of his family at the time mentioned.

Mr. Moody was born in Northfield in 1837, and began his work in life in connection with a firm in Boston. Even at that time he was an active church worker. Later on he came to Chicago, where his activity was so great in religious work that he began to be widely known. After awhile he associated with him Mr. Sankey, the singer, and began an evangelistic tour throughout the country which eventually extended to England, Scotland and Ireland. His work was greatly blessed in Great Britain, as in this country, and wherever he went immense crowds of people gathered to hear him.

In connection with his evangelistic work he established schools in Northfield for the education of young people of both sexes, and a Bible Institute at Chicago. Each year, at his own home, he conducted a sort of Bible Institute at which prominent men of both continents addressed the multitudes who gathered there for instruction. The educational work of Mr. Moody will no doubt be carried on by his family and friends, and will perhaps remain as the most abiding feature of his work.

Mr. Moody was in many respects a remarkable man. His education was very limited, and he was without the graces of oratory and eloquence. To compensate for these deficiencies, however, he was a man of profound religious convictions, and was an eager and intense student of the Bible, which he used constantly and with great effect in his evangelistic work. He was a man, too, of intense faith, and, withal, of a broad, catholic spirit. A Congregationalist by religious affiliation, he operated freely with all other religious bodies in carrying on the work of the Lord. His zeal was not bounded by denominational limits. Mr. Moody's motive was not the building up of a sect, but the salvation of men and the extension of Christ's kingdom. People might and did differ from him in his views of conversion, and in his scriptural interpretations, but no one ever heard him without being impressed with the moral earnestness and sincerity of the man, and with the power of his direct, incisive utterances, carried home to the mind and heart by his homely but apt illustrations.

But the work of the great commoner is ended. He has wrought a great work. He has written his name in imperishable letters upon the age in which he lived. A little while before his death he said to his sons: "I have always been an ambitious man, not ambitious to lay up wealth, but to leave you work to do, and you are going to continue the work of the schools in East Northfield and Mount Hermon and of the Chicago Bible Institute." His last words were: "I see earth receding; heaven is opening; God is calling me." With these words the great evangelist passed into the unseen world. His life suggests many lessons, but we cannot call attention to these now. We simply desire to join with the Christian world in lamenting his loss and in paying this humble tribute to his memory.

EVANGELISTS AND EVANGELISM.*

FOURTH PAPER.

Paul left Titus, an evangelist, in Crete to "set in order the things that were wanting and to appoint elders in every city." Note the fact that Titus, the evangelist, was to APPOINT elders. The plain English of this is that this man was left by Paul, an ambassador of Jesus Christ, on the Island of Crete, to make elders, bishops, pastors, in the churches of God in all the cities. Here is an OFFICIAL AUTHORITY on the part of an evangelist of which we, at the present time in our church life, know nothing.

The kind of man whom he was required to APPOINT to this office is here minutely described. In this description the person who is called an elder is also called a bishop, indicating that in the nomenclature of the apostolic church an elder was a bishop and a bishop was an elder. The same person is, in other parts of the Holy Scripture, called pastor. The evangelist, in the New Testament church, seems to have been the official superior of the functionary who is variously named elder, bishop, pastor. Titus the evangelist was required by Paul to APPOINT elders, bishops or pastors in every city on the Island of Crete, in which there was a Church of Christ. OFFICIAL AUTHORITY of a high order belonged to Titus and to Timothy.

Do the men whom we speak of as evangelists possess such or even similar positions in the churches?

To Titus Paul said: "These things speak, and exhort and reprove with all AUTHORITY." But this AUTHORITY was not altogether official. Read the following: "In all things showing thyself an example of good works in thy doctrine" or teaching—he was a teacher—"showing uncorruptness, gravity, sound speech that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of us." Titus, please observe, in the office of evangelist was to be "an example" to the brethren in "good works." The AUTHORITY which inheres in a godly life was required of one who filled the office of evangelist in that early time.

From this induction of Scripture passages and facts it is clear that the evangelist possessed great AUTHORITY in the church of the apostolic age. It must be apparent to every student of the New Testament that those whom we call evangelists neither do the work nor possess the official AUTHORITY which was done and possessed by the evangelists in the church of the first century. He was commissioned to "reprove" and "rebuke evil-doers with "all AUTHORITY." He was required to "appoint" pastors in the churches. His was to entertain, under certain stipulated conditions, charges against elders, bishops, pastors. Those who were found to be guilty of sin the evangelist was to "rebuke" publicly. The evangelists of that time were not self-appointed. They were set apart to their work in a deliberate, dignified, solemn manner. There was not a more important functionary in the apostolic church than the evangelist.

That the evangelist among us does not occupy the position, do the work nor receive the respect which was accorded the evangelist in New Testament times is evident from the fact that his name seldom appears on the programs of our great conventions and conferences. S. M. Martin introduced his address at the Jubilee Convention with the remark that he was the first "professional evangelist" who had been invited to address one of our national conventions. He was in error on this point. Such a person addressed the convention in Indianapolis in 1897. But that our evangelists are seldom invited to deliver addresses in our great assemblies is true. If the evangelist occupied the place and did the work which belonged to him in the early church his name would appear on the program in every such assembly.

What is the matter? Ought there to be a change? Ought there to be persons in the churches now doing the work and occupying the position of those who are called evangelists in the New Testament? If there ought to be a change, how can it be brought about?

That there is needed in our churches such a work as was done by Timothy and Titus is evident. These men were not alone heralds of mercy; they were teachers of good things as well. They preached and taught: they taught and preached.

Prof. Willett, in the October number of the Christian Quarterly, writes in favor of "A New Vocation"—that of a teacher among the churches. President McGarvey, in the Christian Standard of Nov. 25th, says: "I am glad of an opportunity to commend Bro. Willett for his article, and to commend his proposal to the thoughtful consideration of the brethren. It looks in the direction of restoring one of the ele-

*At the close of the third paper of this series, by a slip of the pen or by a mistake of the printer, I am made to say that Timothy "had a right to go where he was sent for." What I meant to say was Timothy, as an evangelist, "had a right to go where he was NOT sent for. It was not infrequently his duty to do so."

ments of primitive Christianity; for in addition to apostles, prophets, evangelists and shepherds, there was a class in the apostolic church called teachers." The editor of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST approved of what Prof. Willett and Pres. McGarvey said and offered an additional suggestion.

All of which looks in the right direction. But is not the TEACHING function of the evangelist overlooked? There were persons in the apostolic church called teachers. This is true; but a large part of the work of the evangelist, as we have seen, was didactic. There is no intimation in Holy Scripture that the chief work of the evangelist was that of bringing men to a decision for Christ—which seems to be the exclusive work of the present-day evangelist. Let him do more teaching.

B. B. T.

IS THERE ROOM FOR BOTH?

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: — In a recent CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST you state four conceivable attitudes toward higher criticism. Later, Pres. J. W. McGarvey adds a fifth, an expression of his own attitude. Still later, you refuse him this privilege, and pronounce his effort mere trifling. Without questioning the exhaustiveness of your statement of the case, let me point out a very serious difficulty. According to your divisions, yourself and Pres. McGarvey are compelled to occupy one and the same "attitude" toward higher criticism. Neither you nor he occupies the attitude of "indifference" nor of "indiscriminate hostility," nor yet of "indiscriminate acceptance." So there is nothing left for you both but the fourth attitude. Don't you think that the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and President McGarvey will be just a little crowded trying to occupy one and the selfsame attitude towards higher criticism? Can you disentangle this matter? Certainly yourself and President McGarvey have not seemed to be facing exactly the same way!

H. MCDIARMID.

Hiram, O.

Waiving the question as to which of the four attitudes toward higher criticism, indicated by us, best describes the attitude of Pres. McGarvey—a question which we have not discussed—and assuming that it is true that his attitude is not that of "indiscriminate hostility," the puzzle to which Prof. McDiarmid refers is susceptible of easy disentanglement. A man's course is not always consistent with the attitude which he professes to occupy toward any subject. If Pres. McGarvey accepts the legitimacy of higher criticism, when conducted in a right spirit and from proper motives, and believes in giving its conclusions a fair and honest examination, accepting such as commend themselves to sound reason and rejecting such as are found to be untenable, his attitude toward higher criticism is precisely that of ours. It does not follow, however, that we will always agree as to what conclusions of the higher critics are legitimate and what illegitimate. Here there is bound to be a variety of opinions among free and independent thinkers who accept this fourth attitude as the legitimate one. Now the question arrises as to what attitude brethshall sustain toward each other who, believing in the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures, disagree in their opinions as to the actual results of biblical criticism. We may treat each other as equally honest, equally loyal to Christ, and seek, in the spirit of humility and brotherly love, to point out what we conceive to be each other's errors; or, we may denounce each other as unsound in the faith, as willing to compromise the truth, as disloyal to Christ, and do it in a spirit which assumes infallibility of judgment. The latter position, we hold, would be inconsistent with the attitude we profess to hold to higher criticism. The former is the position logically demanded by that attitude. Now as to whether Pres. McGarvey or the editor of this paper is inconsistent with his professed attitude toward higher criticism, is a matter we can leave to others to decide.

Hour of Prayer.

PURPOSES AND HOPES FOR THE NEW YEAR.

(Ex. 14:13; Phil. 3:13-16; Rom. 8:31-39.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Jan. 3.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: The New Year summons us to new duties, and the Word of God calls us to go forward in His strength, fearing no evil.

We gather to-night for the first prayer-meeting in the new year. The old year with its deeds lies in the eternal past, and the new year looms up before us, solemn with its significance and full of calls to duty. The Scriptures which constitute the lesson for the evening are a bugle call to go forward in the work of the Lord. God's word to Israel, at a crucial point in its history, was: "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward!" At another crucial point in the history of the New Testament church, Christians are urged to "go on to perfection," and, "forgetting the things that are behind, and stretching forward unto the things that are before," to "press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Progress, therefore, is the keynote of both Testaments, and the very watchword of the people of God.

New occasions teach new duties;
Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward be, and onward,
Who would keep abreast of truth.

God is calling us, this year, to make progress in the knowledge of His Word and of His ways with men. Let us see to it that we form some systematic plan of Bible study. He is calling us also to a more faithful practice of the truth which we have already learned. Herein lies our greatest failure. Obedience is the organ of knowledge. By doing we learn the will of God. We are called upon to go forward in a fuller and completer surrender of our lives to the divine will and service. This will open to us wider spheres of Christian activity and will greatly increase our usefulness.

There may be the fleshpots of Egypt to leave behind us, with all the allurements and prizes of a sinful world, but having turned our faces Zionward we are exhorted to forget the things which are behind and reach out after the grander things that are before. O, that we might have a vision of some of the glorious things that are before us, in order that we might be weaned from an undue attachment to the things of the world!

Who can tell what mighty things are to come to pass during this new year? Great events lie in the future. it is a great thing to live in an age like this.

All around us, fair with flowers,
Fields of beauty sleeping lie;
All around us clarion voices
Call to duty stern and high.

Blessed are the ears that hear these calls of God to advance, and that are ready to respond to the calls.

But are there no difficulties or dangers ahead? Does not this advance involve conflict with the evil that is within us, and those evils which are without? Does not this going forward involve sacrifices of personal ease and comfort, and the subordination of the lower to the higher nature? Undoubtedly so. But "if God is for us, who can be against us. . . . Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" Not if Christ be in us, the hope of glory. "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

In the strength of this confidence let us face, resolutely and fearlessly, the duties of the new year.

PRAYER.

We thank Thee, our Father, for the birth of the new year, and that we are permitted the privilege of seeing it dawn, and to have some share in its duties and responsibilities. What Thou seest to be wrong in the past, in our lives, we humbly ask Thee to forgive, and we sincerely invoke Thy strength and grace that the new year upon which we have entered may witness greater progress in our Christian lives than in any previous year. May it be our earnest purpose, not only to live better ourselves, but to help others to a better life, that they, also, may share with us in the joy of this salvation. Dear Father, as we face the unknown future, we would put our hands in Thine and ask Thee to lead us in paths of service and of righteousness, and to use us for Thy glory. And this we ask in Christ's name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair.

No season of the year, perhaps, appeals more strongly to the imagination than the close of the Old Year and the coming in of the New. Nor has any theme appealed more strongly to the poets than the resistless and remorseless march of Time. It requires the poetic temperament—that is, the power of imagination to make real what others apprehend but do not appreciate—to deal adequately with such themes. Henry Kirke White, the soaring young genius whose sun went down before it was yet noon, wrote thus of "Irresistible Time:"

"Unmoved and heedless thou dost hear the rush
Of mighty generations as they pass
To the broad gulf of ruin, and dost stamp
Thy signet on them, and they rise no more.
Who shall contend with Time—unvanquished Time,
The conqueror of conquerors, the lord
Of desolation?—Lo, the shadows fly,
The hours and days, the years and centuries,
They fly, they fly, and nations rise and fall,
The young are old, the old are in their graves."

Why, then, should the "spirit of mortals be proud?" Is there any hing more unseemly, illogical and grotesque than the life of the average man of the world, in the light of this truth of the brevity of life and the all-conquering power of Time? Why do not men act under the law of their higher nature, over which Time exercises no such imperial control?

The answer to the foregoing question lies in the fact that we know a great many truths, the significance of which we do not realize. The above is one of them. All men recognize the rapid flight of time, and what this involves as to the material form of our existence, but how few of us realize it! If we could all take into our minds and hearts the full significance of the brevity of life, as compared with eternity or as compared with the work which we desire to accomplish, would it not revolutionize our modes of living? Would men waste their precious time as they now do, in pursuits which have no bearing on the real purpose of our existence and on our future well-being? Think of the folly of men devoting their brief lives to the accumulation of wealth and then lying down and dying without doing anything with it! Think of the vanity of rational men being puffed up with pride of intellect, of wealth, of social position, of office, with a little brief authority, when, in a little while, all these things will have vanished like a dream and those who sought them will stand unmasked before the judgment seat of Christ to be judged by the characters they have formed, by the good they have done! One value of these seasons is to awaken in us the power of imagination which, under the guidance of Chistian faith, enables us to realize and feel the power of these truths. This, too, is one of the great offices of the poets.

The brilliant George D. Prentice, under the spell of the midnight hour of the dying year, sang:

"Remorseless Time!
Fierce spirit of the glass and scythe—what power
Can stay him in his silent course, or melt
His iron heart to pity? * * *
Time
Knows not the weight of sleep or weariness,
And night's deep darkness has no chain to bind
His rushing pinion."

"Remorseless," indeed, is Time's onward march. How many fond hopes have been crushed beneath his resistless tread! What ravages he has made in the ranks of the living during the year which is now closing! What a mighty army they would make who, during the year past, have been laid low by the iron hand of Time! No wonder the imaginative Greeks spoke of Kronos as devouring his children. How stealthy his soft tread! At first only a few gray hairs, dimming eyesight, followed by failing powers, the decrepitude of age, and the end, when our little life is rounded out with a sleep. How brief it all is! "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom!" The clock is ticking away toward the midnight hour. . .

" 'Tis midnight's holy hour, and silence now
Is brooding like a gentle spirit o'er
A still and pulseless world!
Hark! on the winds
The bells' deep tones are swelling—'tis the knell
Of the departed year."

Good-bye, 1899! Welcome, 1900!

Questions and Answers.

What were the two cups mentioned in Luke 22:17 20? M B.

One of them was that used in connection with the Paschal Supper. It was at the close of that meal that our Savior took, first the bread and then the cup, and gave them to his disciples as emblems of his body and of his blood. The contents of the cup were no doubt the same, but in the latter case there was a new significance given to the fruit of the vine.

1. What are the true reasons or grounds of monogamic marriages as opposed to polygamy and polyandry?

2. What are the grounds of objection to polygamous or plural marriages?

3. If polygamy is wrong, why did not God reprove or disapprove it in some way in the cases of Abraham, Solomon, David, etc., instead of seeming to sanction it by his silence? C. J. Kimball.

St. Louis, Dec. 15, 1899.

1. The true reasons or grounds for the law governing marriage—one wife to one husband and one husband to one wife—are to be found in the nature of man. The very nature of the marriage relation is such that it can only exist in its purity between one man and one woman. The human heart cannot give its undivided affection, in this relationship, to more than one person. The establishment and maintenance of the family and of the home, together with the proper care and training of the young, is involved in monogamy, or single marriage. The violation of this law has always brought alienation, confusion, the destruction of true love and the breaking up of the home. It is hardly possible to exaggerate the importance of maintaining the purity and unity of the home and of the family as the source of our religious, political and social life.

2. The reasons for single marriages constitute the ground for objection to polygamous or plural marriages.

3. God has had to educate the race out of a great many of its evils. Polygamy was one of these. It never existed with the approval of God, even in the cases of Abraham, David and Solomon. The history of all these men shows that God's disapprobation rested upon their polygamous marriages, as indicated by the troubles which grew out of them. It must always be borne in mind that God's revelation to men has been a progressive one, and that he deals with the race at any time according to its measure of light and knowledge. It would be a very mistaken idea to suppose that what God tolerated in the times of the patriarchs He would approve now. We are living in the effulgent light of Christ's life and teachings, and have no need to go back to Old Testament times for the ethical standard of marriage or of any other institution among men.

If our calendar were to be corrected so as to correspond with the present understanding as to the time of Christ's birth, what year would this be? A Reader.

Opinions vary as to the exact time of Christ's birth, but it is generally agreed that it was from three to five years before the beginning of the Christian era according to the present calendar. Taking four years as the average estimate, and dating the calendar accordingly, this present Christmas would be in A. D. 1903.

In your issue of October 19 Bro. Power says: "Well might Jesus say, 'Search the Scriptures.' Did Jesus say this? Fill out the sentence in John 5:39 (King James). Read the context, and the declarative rather than the imperative appears. Then see revised versions, and it appears most probable that Jesus said to the unbelieving and angry Jews, "Ye search the Scriptures [Old Testament], for ye think ye have eternal life in them." Now, is it not a good thing to search the Scriptures? Assuredly so; also, to understand them and teach them plainly, bringing out every attitude of Jesus and the Jews, et al. The writer often met this saying in the South, "Jesus said, 'Search the Scriptures.' " And it is not confined there. When I noticed the use of it made by our esteemed Bro. Power I thought something must be done. Now I've done it. Will the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST tell us all about this? J. F. Callahan.

The verb "search" is in the indicative mode, as stated above, and the quotation is a statement of a fact rather than the inculcation of a duty. The fact, however, that the Old Testament Scriptures do testify of Christ is a good reason for searching them. But "eternal life" can be found only in Christ, not in a book, nor in any ritual. The Jews saw the Book, but not "the Man in the Book."

How I Repaid Them.

My people, out of their goodness of heart, saw fit to pass me "from labor to refreshment," in sending me to the "Jubilee Convention." Much has been said about the vastness of the convention numerically, and of the depth and richness of the moral stream of power that flowed therefrom, and truly it was most refreshing to both mind and spirit. There we saw and met many after whom we had read for years, and towering among them like Saul of old was the sage of Grovetown, Ga., whose articles are so pleasing and edifying to the brotherhood The spirit of fraternity and love obtained in all our sessions, and rested like the dove of peace upon the assembled thousands. To say that the addresses and papers were of a high order is putting it tamely, for the speakers often carried us to mountain peaks of joy, from whence we could look out upon ever-widening horizons of truth. It was indeed a pleasure to meet and hear our brethren Durban and Spring, of England, who brought to us the greetings of Christians from the "motherland." Brother Durban takes high rank among Christian writers, and his "English Topics" in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST are joyfully received and very edifying. When Brother Durban before the convention and in such a beautiful spirit presented the offering of the C. W. B M. of England, it was most touching and impressive The celebration of the Lord's Supper, in which about 14 000 participated, we suspect is without parallel on this continent, and possibly in the history of the church universal. The deep solemnity of the occasion, the soul-stirring sermon, the deep and rich music rolling like waves of light, the beauty and simplicity of the service, were events of a lifetime and very inspiring.

But we started to tell how we repaid our home brethren for sending us to the convention.

We have tried to do this by delivering to good houses six addresses and sermons on the "Fruit of the Jubilee Convention," and we are not certain that we are through yet. My people have been much interested in these efforts and their spiritual life quickened.

NINE DECADES OF HISTORY

THE CHRISTIAN WOMAN'S BOARD OF MISSIONS.

1884—1899.

LOIS A. WHITE.

This board, divinely designed to inaugurate in the Christian brotherhood teaching missions and training in missionary effort on behalf of our boys and girls, early felt the guiding of the Spirit. At the National C. W. B. M. Convention in Louisville, Ky., October, 1875, a committee on "Best Methods of Cultivating a Missionary Spirit and Disseminating Missionary Intelligence" reported: "In order to cultivate a missionary spirit, we regard it of prime importance that we begin with the young. We, therefore, recommend the adoption of a system of regular contributions for missionary purposes in all our Sunday-schools, either by missionary boxes or by setting apart one contribution every month. . . . This plan is recommended here upon the ground of the influence of systematic, self-denying benevolence upon mind and heart." The first national superintendent of children's work of the C. W. B. M., Mrs. Joseph King, Allegheny, Pa., says: "Very soon after the organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions many of its members, seeing the great blessing it was proving to be in cultivating the spiritual and intellectual life of our sisters, felt that we must add to the first object of its organization the duty of educating the young people of our churches in mission work—not only for the sake of perpetuating and extending the influence of this society, but for the more important one of developing the religious nature of the children and giving them an intelligent interest in the great work that has been opened up to the church in this last quarter of the nineteenth century. Circles and bands were organized as opportunity offered, but it was not until ten years had passed that it was taken up as a special work." At the Missouri State Convention, in 1884, Mrs. Eastin, Mrs. King and M. Lucilla Payne had several conferences on the subject and, after earnest prayer, decided to lay the matter before the National Convention, to meet in St. Louis the following week. This was done by Miss Payne. The convention elected Mrs. King for national superintendent and directed the work begun; but it was February, 1885, before the constitution was ready for distribution, and in the Missionary Tidings of that month appeared the first letter of the national superintendent. The response was immediate and enthusiastic. Of the twenty eight mission bands organized before October 1, the one at Morris X Roads, Pa., reported first. Contributions from bands amounted, to that date, to $147 03. The report for 1889-'90 stated the bands numbered 447, and the contributions in that year were $4,927.76; 1894 '95, bands, circles and contributing Junior C. E Societies together numbered 670, and contributions amounted to $5,548.61 in the Builders' Fund; 1898-'99, bands and Intermediate and Junior C. E Societies together, numbered 999 organizations contributing to the C. W. B. M., and receipts to the Builders' Fund totaled $9,157.54. Besides the words of the first national superintendent, already quoted, showing her estimate, and that of the board, of "the weightier matters of the law"—the cultivation of the child in those thoughts and deeds that obey the command to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness"—the second national superintendent, Mrs. J. C. Black, testified to the same truth. By funds raised through our Young People's Department, buildings have been erected in Japan, the United States, India and Jamaica to the number of twenty-five, comprising chapels, bungalows, schoolhouses and hospital and orphanage buildings. When a portion of these had been put up Mrs. Black wrote, in 1895: "Valuable to our Master's service as are these buildings, resulting from the financial consecration of our young people, fully as precious in his sight must be the reflex benefits upon the soul-development of those called the 'Little Builders' of the C. W. B. M. The superstructure of their Christian characters, builded upon the Rock, contains the possibilities of personal salvation and of the perpetuation and development of all the varied church activities in the homeland. The scope of the C. W. B. M. as a developing power is manifested in the individual lives of the members of our earlier organizations, who are efficient Junior C. E. and mission band superintendents, Endeavor officials, Sunday-school teachers and practical workers in all lines of local church work. . . . This department includes the child in the homeland from the time of its first knowledge of a needy world and a bountiful God to the time when that same individual becomes a dispenser of God's bounty to the physically, mentally and spiritually needy ones who may be reached by individual or organized work throughout the whole wide world which must be redeemed for Christ. In foreign lands it includes the helpless children until the time when they can carry the light into the dark homes." The third national superintendent, Mattie Pounds, who has served in that office since 1896, wrote in her last annual report: "The psalmist admonished Israel that they 'shew to the generation to come the praises of the Lord and his strength and his wonderful works that he hath done. . . . That the generation to come might know these things, that they might set their hope in God, and not forget the work of God, but keep his commandments; and might not be as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation.' The desire to further so all-important a purpose actuated some of our sisters to undertake this work, so greatly blessed from the beginning by our God and Father. . . . The superintendents of bands and societes, those who have met with the children week by week during month after month, and have patiently trained them for efficient service, have been the chiefest workers. . . . The boys and girls have willingly and gladly given part and sometimes all of their little store that the children in benighted lands might be blessed. Into their giving have often entered a devotion and self denial of which their elders, in their larger offerings, have known nothing. And the work will surely have the approval and the blessing of him who still observes what is cast into the treasury." Two years ago the motto, "We for Christ: Christ for all," was adopted for the Young People's Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. From the publishing of the national superintendent's first letter in February, 1885, already mentioned, the Missionary Tidings contained a department that subserved the interests of our children's work as best it could. To meet the needs of this growing child the C. W. B. M. began with the issue for May, 1890, the publication of the Little Builders at Work, an eight-page monthly paper, devoted to our Young People's Department. From the first it has been an illustrated magazine containing letters from our missionaries and the bands, articles about the places where work was being done with the money from the children, and meeting programs, with helps for the same. With May, 1896, the name became the Junior Builders. The number of pages has been several times increased. In her last annual report, Miss Pounds wrote:

> The Junior Builders, the official organ of the department, with the October issue (our convention number), came out in a new dress, and now hopes to be considered a thing of beauty. It has been increased from sixteen to twenty-four pages, without increasing the subscription price. The four pages additional to those ordered by the last convention were a necessity, if little stories on the topics for the meetings and short exercises were to be published, for both of which there was great demand. Though the paper is far from self supporting, yet through its influence is secured the larger part of the offerings for the missionary work in which the young people are engaged.

Our first president wrote: "There are clearly enunciated three prominent objects existing in the minds of the founders of the society: First. The habit of systematic giving, which was to be, not only of practical benefit to all church enterprises, but also a spiritual benefit to individuals. Second. The training of the young, in order that the next generation may devise infinitely greater things and bring to God an infinitely richer, fuller, more joyful service than this has attained to. Third. The dissemination of missionary literature—the light to dispel in minds of Christians ignorance and doubts and objections as to God's will and our duty toward the world." She discerned an effort in the last-named object and the germ of our Leaflet Department in the following portion of a committee report read in the 1875 annual convention: "To endeavor to bring missionary intelligence into the hands of every woman and child in all of our churches, of such a nature and in such a form that they will be induced to read it, we recommend that circular letters or tracts be prepared and addressed to women in all our churches to create a spirit of inquiry as to what we are doing; and that we take measures to have interesting missionary matter in all our periodicals—such as incidents in heathen lands calculated to awaken interest in and sympathy for people without the Bible and items of intelligence with regard to the successful missionary labors of other churches." Of the one hundred or more varieties of leaflet literature that the C. W. B. M. has issued, numbering from 50 to 25,000 copies of a variety, some of the very earliest were written by Joseph King. Mrs. King, Mrs. Atkinson and Mrs. Shortridge were especially active in starting that branch of work which was conducted from the King home in Allegheny City from 1885 until 1889 after the C. W. B. M. was settled in its office at 160 N. Delaware St., Indianapolis, and I had gone there to assist Mrs. Shortridge. Now stockroom and cabinet shelves are crowded with this blessed seed-sowing material, of which thousands of packages are being mailed each year to local society, district and state workers. How many a "Bishop's Conversion" has been effected through this means is known only to the "bishops" themselves and the one who is our Master. Some of the publications, like Miss Payne's "Historical Sketch," Mrs. Christian's "C. W. B. M. Manual," C. C. Smith's "Jamaica Mission," and Miss Dickinson's "Historical Sketch," attained almost to the rank of booklets. There is no question about that name being applied to the Junior C. E. Manual and the Junior Song Book, prepared by Miss Pounds and Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds.

The service of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, divinely committed to His handmaidens while at the throne of mercy their hearts pleaded: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me do?" has ever been bound to the throne by chains of prayer. In the May, 1875, board meeting Mrs. Pearre called attention to the fact that the close of the second quarter of that first missionary year had been reached. Summing up what had been accomplished, as a cause for encouragement, she urged a more prayerful consecration of ourselves; suggesting that all members of the society, far and near, be requested to spend the hour of the regular monthly meeting in prayer. While that was not nationally appointed, its thought aided in preparing the way for the adoption of our "Hour of Prayer" from 5 to 6 P. M. every Lord's day, the call to which has graced the editorial column of the Missionary Tidings about ten years. Mrs. Burgess, at Allegheny City, in 1891, in her first national convention as president, gave in her address the account of our "Hour of Prayer:" "None knew better than the sainted Joseph King the blessing that comes to the Christian through communion with God. He was truly a man of faith. He walked and talked with God. . . . In the Tidings of July, 1887, under the head, 'A Timely Suggestion,' are these words from his pen: 'In order to succeed in missionary work it is necessary that we read, think and pray. By reading we become intelligent, by thinking we digest what we read and make it a part of our mental and moral constitution; by work we set forces in operation and bring about results; without which all else is vain. Would it not be well for the executive committee to fix upon and name a day and hour each week for prayer, when all whose hearts move them to pray may retire to their closets and make united supplication for the cause of missions, for missionaries and their work, and the churches? The improvement of such an hour as suggested would be a means of incalculable good. What an inspiration to our missionaries to know that on a certain hour in every week thousands pray for them. And above all, it would make glad the heart of Christ.' At our national convention the following October, 5 o'clock Sunday evening of each week was set apart as the hour. . . . Do we ever think how Jesus spent whole nights in communion with his Father and our Father? Do we call to mind Gethsemane, in which Jesus, with his great heart crushed under the load of our gilt, uttered his thrice repeated prayer, closing with, 'Not my will, but thine be done?' If there was comfort for the Son of God in such an hour may not we, his followers, hope for comfort and blessings from the same eternal source? . . . As one by one our missionaries have gone out, so far as I remember in every instance the last request as they looked into our faces was, 'Pray for us.' We know that means a great deal, and let us take our vow this day that we will observe that hour in our closests and on our knees, if so circumstanced that we can, but under all circumstances that we will bear the missionaries and their work up before God. And do not forget your executive committee, that they may have wisdom from above in the duties that come to them." Small wonder, under such teaching and practice, that the C. W. B. M. was led, three years ago, to adopt an annual Easter week of prayer and thank-offerings, and was ready to heartily join, in 1898, with the other missionary boards in a call to the churches for a monthly concert of prayer for missions.

An issue of the Ann Arbor (Mich.) Evening Times, early in 1898, stated: "In the south side room of the brick house, just dismantled on the corner of State St. and N. University Ave., then occupied by Dr. Arndt, at that time dean of the Homeopathic Medical College, there gathered, on a Sunday afternoon in the winter of 1887, a little company of less than a dozen to hold a simple service and make arrangements for regular meetings. None of them were rich; most of them were students, except the Doctor and two mothers of students, but all were enthusiastic Disciples and several were old teachers, accustomed to religious work at home. Later they occupied the Congregational parlors, with meetings at 4:30 Sunday afternoons, throughout the college year. Vacations found those students in their various home churches stirring up an interest for their Ann Arbor mission, till in October, 1891, lo! the dedication of the commodious chapel, so much admired on the south side of the campus, and a regular pastor. All this had been secured through the aid of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions of that church at large." A tablet in that chapel, inscribed: "In memory of Sarah Hawley Scott, departed February, 1887," indicates the source of the major part of the money used in its erection. The bequests from Mrs. Scott to the A. C. M. S., the Michigan State Missionary Society and the Detroit Auxiliary were paid to the C. W. B. M. to unite with its own and put up this building. These bequests realized a total of $10,719 95. The remainder of the $17,000 expended for the entire property was made up by special contributions almost equally divided between the Michigan Disciples and the members of the C. W. B. M. The board also made a direct appropriation of $692, covering insurance and entire furnishing, including heating aparatus. This house, with a seating capacity of 600, stands on S. University Ave., overlooking the university campus and facing the Museum of Natural History. It is thus on a thoroughfare constantly traversed by crowds of students and visitors. It is proving a highway for the gospel to the nations. Although the "dozen" mentioned in that first group now count a church membership of 208, the last three years receiving 75 by baptism—a far larger per cent of gain by conversions than has been made by the larger and older churches of the city—the make-up described in '87 is true to-day—not rich, but enthusiastic Disciples. It is a mission church, only the last year paying an installment on preacher's salary, but they are faithful and generous to meet heavy current expenses and have share in missionary enterprises. Besides, in an especial sense its own local church life is not the end of its existence. As the forerunner and coadjutor of our Bible Chair work it will have its chief place and joy. Its first pastor, Chas. A. Young, said: "The heart of the Reformation is the Disciples, the heart of the Disciples is the Christian Woman's Board of Mission, and the heart of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is the Bible Chair work." The truth to complete the circuit back to the heart of heaven is the heart of the Bible Chair work is C. A. Young and the heart of C. A. Young is Christ. Bro. Young could have done little or nothing without the intelligent sympathy and royal support of Mrs. Burgess, Mrs. Christian, Mrs. Black, Miss Dickinson, Mrs. Atkinson, Mrs. Miles, Mrs. Ford, Mrs. Thomson, H. L. Willett, J. W. McGarvey, J. H. Garrison, and later, Col. Cary, Prof. Kent, Miss Cary, Miss Kent, Mrs. Moses, G. P. Coler and W. M. Forrest. Yet, it has ever been he who at the cost of self denials known only to the Man of Galilee has made a place for the work at the universities, and in the approval of national educators, and led in informing and rallying supporters. He had been the pastor at Ann Arbor one year when those whom he had interested gave this matter its first publicity August, 1892, in a Michigan state convention. The committee there appointed to encourage the endowment of an English Bible Chair in connection with ths work already inaugurated in Ann Arbor, reported by Miss Abby Field at the next national convention, Nashville, October 15, 1892, bespeaking its indorsement by the C. W. B. M., to secure for the undertaking the recognition due from the university officials and the community at large and to make it possible to raise and receive the necessary funds for the endowment of one or more chairs. Mrs. Burgess had bravely prepared the way by saying in her president's address the same day: "We can see that it is the place and the time for sowing the seed of the kingdom and instilling into the lives of young men and women the teaching of Jesus. This faithfully done will bear much fruit, even to the ends of the earth. To say that here is the most promising opening for taking hold of the young and preparing them for usefulness in the mission field, of any in our own land, is no reflection upon our own schools. The way is open, if we have the courage to undertake it, for the establishment of an English Bible Chair. . . . The great university is already established there and the courtesies of the institution are offered us. The demand for Bible study can be met by endowing a chair and putting a competent teacher in charge. Wherever our young people gather we should be ready to fit them for usefulness in the work of their choice, whether it be the professions or the ministry. Many graduates of our own colleges, going there for special work, are anxious at the same time to pursue their Bible studies. Would it not be wise to take advantage of such an opportunity for good? A work of that kind ought to be done without in any way affecting our general work. Just how, I do not know, but if it is duty, the way will be made plain." Sweetly has this prediction been verified as the angels have rolled away the sealed stones of difficulties and sat upon them, emblazoning the march of our risen Lord to world-wide conquest. Classes were organized and the teaching begun at Ann Arbor in October, 1893. The first instructors were Herbert Willett and Clinton Lockhart. They have been followed by Chas. A. Young, G. P. Coler and W. M. Forrest. The report, dated Sept. 8, 1899, contained the following from Prof. Coler:

The year just closed has been one of the most encouraging years in the history of our work. It used to be a question whether university students would take time for Bible study for which they would receive no credit in the university. This question has been satisfactorily answered in the affirmative. I think you will readily recognize the significance of the following figures, which give the enrollment in the Ann Arbor Bible Chair classes from the time the work was begun to the present date:

1894–5	54
1895–6	95
1896–7	130
1897–8	136
1898–9	183
Total	657

Nearly all of these were university students. A few were citizens of Ann Arbor or wives of students. Many other students have attended Bible Institutes or lecture courses given under the auspices of the Bible Chairs. Most of those who enrolled in our classes are already Christians. A few have become Christians as the direct result of our instruction and personal influence. One of these, a law student who graduated this year, and who is a young man of fine ability and character, wrote to me this summer as follows: "I feel like expressing to you at this time my gratitude for your kindness to me. You have made my life richer and better. May God help you to do for others what you have done for me." How many have been indirectly influenced by this work to become Christians we cannot tell; nor can we tell how many who were already Christians have been influenced by us, directly or indirectly, to hold fast to their faith and to live more earnest Christian lives. But it is interesting to think of the more than six hundred students who have been in our classes as they go forth to all parts of the world to take prominents positions in life. We know that many of them—lawyers, doctors and teachers—are carrying into their professional life a better understanding of the Bible and a greater enthusiasm for Christian work than they would have done had they not been in our classes. Not a few have become Sunday-school teachers, and thus our Bible teaching is to be multiplied manyfold. Some are missionaries in foreign lands, and several others will soon go to foreign fields to devote their lives to missionary work. Nearly all are advocates of better Bible teaching, and some are warm friends of our Ann Arbor Bible Chairs.

THE MINISTER AND HIS LIBRARY.

W. J. RUSSELL.

5. Biography should have an important place in the minister's library. According to Carlyle, "universal history, the history of what man has accomplished in this world, is at bottom the history of the great men who have worked here." Biographical literature is so large that one cannot hope to compass it; but the minister should not fail to let himself feel the peculiar inspiration to be found only in such books as Plutarch's Lives. Through the centuries this book has exercised and still exercises its charm over men of all classes and ages and grades of culture by describing the "great men who while living wrought out the destinies of their time, and who after death stood for centuries and still stand as models after which the aspiring soul tries to shape itself." Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson can never be neglected by the preacher who would come into living contact with this great Christian man who by such gigantic effort and struggle so largely revolutionized England. It would be difficult to mention the names of the men and women who "have blest the middle walks of life, in which they were born, with beauty and fruitfulness of character." The Life of Charles Kinsley; Irving's Columbus and Washington; Franklin's Autobiography; Carlyle's Cromwell and Frederick the Great; and the lives of such men as Lincoln, Webster, Grant, Garfield and others whom I need not mention—these are books with which the minister should be familiar. Then, too, there are our servants of song. Longfellow, Whittier, Bryant, Holmes and Lowell—how rich were their lives! And there was Tennyson, "the sweet historian of the heart." Alfred Lord Tennyson, A Memoir by His Son, in two superb volumes, is the richest thing in the biographical line that this century has produced. Yet, rich as these works are, the minister can scarcely complete his fitting for the pulpit without an acquaintance with the best biographies of those whose lines of work most nearly approximate his own—great missionary workers and great preachers. What inspiration must come from reading the lives of Wesley and Whitefield, David Brainerd and Henry Martyn, Carey and Judson, Eliot and Zinzendorf and all that host of spirit-endued men! What help to higher, holier purpose must come from familiarity with Dr. Blaikie's new Personal Life of David Livingstone, with the Memoir of William C. Burns, of China; with the story of Mackay, of Uganda; with the Autobiographies of Charles H. Spurgeon, of the London Tabernacle; and Dr. John G. Payton, of the New Hebrides Mission! But enough has been said to show how vast and rich the stores of biography that appeal to the minister for a reading and what a marvelous girding for his work and tremendous impulse and momentum in it they promise to the diligent, receptive and responsive reader.

6. Science certainly claims some representatives in the minister's library. It is a mistake to suppose that physical science is a study that is foreign and even alien to ministerial equipment. It has taken too large a place in the thought of men to be ignored. There is a seductive popular impression abroad that the Bible cannot endure the fearless critical methods of modern research. It is one of the highest functions of the minister of Christ to-day to meet and neutralize this widespread skepticism. His knowledge must not be superficial and second-hand. He must be a master of those points where scientific inquiry touches his lines of work. On his library shelves, alongside of his exegetical and theological works, should be found the leading substantial works of scientific authors. Mention might be made of the following: Humboldt's Cosmos and Travels; Bacon's Novum Organum; Gray's Natural Science and Religion; Hugh Miller's Testimony of the Rocks; Winchell's Sketches of Creation and Walks and Talks in the Geological World; Youman's Correlation and Conservation of Forces; Fairhurst's Organic Evolution Considered; Young's volume on the Sun, and LeConte's work on Geology. These are great works, and have been written by specialists in the realm of science. They confirm the truth of God in his written revelation and declare that both science and revelation are two angels, walking hand in hand.

7. Social science should not be neglected. There are many to day who are beginnig to believe what Epictetus said to his own age in the far distant past: "You will do the greatest service to the state if you shall raise, not the roofs of the houses, but the souls of the citizens; for it is better that great souls should dwell in small houses rather than for mean slaves to lurk in great houses." Many of our great scholars are writing upon subjects which have reference to the amelioration of humanity. The minister of the gospel to-day cannot afford to be ignorant of what is being said or written by these men about existing evils and the proposed organization of industry. As helpful to the understanding of these vital questions, the following books are commended: Herbert Spencer's Study in Sociology and Man versus the State; Mill's Principles of Political Economy; Rogers' Economic Interpretation of History; Mallock's Inequalities of Society; Henry George's Progress and Poverty; Bellamy's Looking Backward; Bryce's American Commonwealth; Strong's The New Era; Kidd's Social Evolution, and Lorimer's Christianity and the Social State. What we need is more enlightenment on the great subjects discussed in these volumes. "Not dynamite," says Lorimer, "but intelligence, is the hope of the world; not brutality, but reason shall determine the reforms of the future." Books are more potent than bullets in righting wrongs and slaying oppressions. Only as they are understood and only as they create a large view of humanity and its needs, and only as they shall inspire in the direction of peaceful and practical endeavors will the new generation thrill to the voice of the poet as he calls:

> "Ring out the want, the care, the sin,
> The faithless, coldness of the times;
> Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
> Ring in redress to all mankind."

EVOLUTION OF THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

No. 2.—Organization.

J. FRAISE RICHARD.

In a previous article it was shown that the followers or pupils of Christ were, during his personal ministry, called "disciples." This continued to be the name while they were treated as individuals, in their unorganized capacity. Organization was to succeed this personal and individual condition of things.

We are now prepared to take a further step, and for that purpose invite attention to several propositions:

PROPOSITION 1. The disciples of Christ were through the agency of the apostles collected into an organization known as his church, whose organic existence began in Jerusalem, on the day of Pentecost, A. D 33.

After Peter, in the region of Cæsarea Philippi, made the confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," Jesus said: "Upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matt. 16:18).

This is a prophecy of an organization whose consummation was to be realized in the future.

1. The prophet Micah said (chapter 4, verses 1 and 2): "In the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and people shall flow into it. And many nations shall come and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for the law shall go forth of Zion and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

Let several things be carefully noted in the foregoing language: (1) The events enumerated were to occur "in the last days." (2) The scenes were to take place in the "top of the mountains," in a site "exalted above the hills." (3) It was predicted that "people shall flow into it." (4) "Many nations shall come" to the consecrated spot with the docile spirit which enabled them to say of the God of Jacob, "He shall teach us of his ways, and we shall walk in his paths." (5) They further made the significant declaration that "the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." All this language looks forward to and is interpreted only by a careful reading of the scenes enacted at Jerusalem as recorded in the first and second chapter of Acts of the Apostles.

2. Jesus, after his crucifixion, resurrection and personal interviews with his disciples, but immediately preceding his ascension, called his apostles and gave them the commission, by which they were to convert the world. Luke's version (chapter 24, verses 46, 47) contains the statement of Jesus that "repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem;" but contains the further injunction, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." Even at this date the "beginning" was fixed "at Jerusalem."

If now we turn to Luke's narrative, as recorded in the first chapter of Acts, we shall find the additional instruction given by Jesus to his apostles in the execution of his commission: "Ye shall receive power after the Holy Spirit is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem and in all Judea and in Samaria and unto the uttermost part of the earth" (Acts 1:8).

3. Now let the scenes depicted in the second chapter of Acts be carefully read. Peter's sermon on that occasion, in which he used the keys that were entrusted to him by the Savior, unfolds the facts that attended the establishment of the church. The climax was reached when he addressed the assembled Jews in the statement: "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ."

The effect was thrilling, soul-piercing, heart-conquering. The narrative is: "Now when they heard this they were pricked in the heart, and said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?

"Then Peter said unto them, Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." . . . "Then they that gladly received his word were baptized; and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls." Note the language, "added unto them," viz., the disciples and apostles. In the last verse of the chapter the term "church" is used for the first time, an organization having been accomplished meanwhile. Hence the declaration, "The Lord added the saved daily to the church."

4. That this was the "beginning" of the church, as was promised by the prophet Micah, and by Jesus, and expected by the disciples and apostles, is made clear by attending to the scenes connected with the second use of the keys at the conversion of Cornelius and his household as recorded in the 10th and 11th chapters of Acts. In his own version of it Peter says (Acts 11:15): "As I began to speak the Holy Spirit fell upon them [the Gentiles] as on us [Jews] at the beginning." "This is conclusive. The apostle Paul was therefore justified in saying, "Jerusalem is the mother of us all."

PROPOSITION 2. This church is the Church of Christ and should be called by no other name.

1. Suppose that in the will of President Washington a statement of this kind should occur: "On this condition I will bequeath my home to the American people, and it shall ever remain in their possession." How would the expression "my home" be translated? Two difficulties must be overcome: 1. The thought must must be translated from the first to the third person. 2. It must preserve the precise meaning. The expression "my home" to us means "Washington's home," or "the home of Washington." It does not mean the Washington home; for that might signify something wholly different.

Peter's confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," was proper when made, in the second person, direct to Jesus himself; but when the truth was translated by the Ethiopian eunuch into the third person it stood, "Jesus Christ is the Son of God."

The same argument applies to the expression "my church" (mou tan ekklesian). The possessive pronoun "my," which is in the first person, must be translated into its equivalent in the third person. The only just equivalent is "Christ's Church" or the "Church of Christ."

2. These additional reasons are given for the foregoing name:

(1) Jesus, as the Savior of the world, was invested with all authority in heaven and on earth to establish and endow his church, and therefore give it his own name (Matt. 28:18).

(2) Christ is the precious foundation laid in Zion as prophesied by Isaiah (28:18) and affirmed by the Apostle Paul (1 Cor. 3:11; Eph. 20:20).

(3) It is his body (Col. 1:24).

(4) He purchased it with his own blood (Acts 20:28).

(5) "He is the Head of the church" Col. 1:18)

(6) "The church is subject unto Christ" (Eph 5:14).

(7) His church is "the pillar and ground of the truth" (1 Tim. 2:15).

(8) "Christ loved the church and he gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word; that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish" (Eph. 5:25 27).

(9) The church is the bride and Christ is the bridegroom. As a loyal bride it must wear his name. It is the only name under heaven which has salvation connected with it.

Systematic Bible Study.

The recent article by Prof. H. L. Willett in reference to a more thorough Bible study in our congregations was timely

Every church ought to have a class for the systematic study of the Bible. The church at Pittsfield has been giving attention to this during the last four years. Each Monday evening is used by the pastor in leading a class in Bible work. We are now having a course on the History of the Church.

The work is both pleasant and profitable for the preacher. It compels him to study his text-book. It helps him in his preaching, as his mind is ever fresh regarding the history and teachings contained in the old Book. Every church should have a Bible institute of one week each year, led by a master in the art. Here is an open door for many men of ability who can make this work interesting. No dry series will suit the people. It must be attractive in some way so as to interest the masses.

Several years ago Chas. A. Young held for me an institute of four days. The whole community was aroused. Our audiences ran from one hundred to three hundred. The people are hungry for a reasonable and simple interpretation of the old Book. The Disciples of Christ occupy vantage ground now. Will we occupy it?

Not less evangelistic work, but more explanation of the Word of God. Pastors, evangelists and Bible institute workers should be in sympathy with one another and realize that each occupies a wide and, in a sense, a separate field. RUSSELL F. THRAPP.

BIBLE COLLEGE AT HOME.

Thorough Bible course by mail, leading to diploma and degree. Terms, only $1.00 per month. Circulars for stamp. Write Prof. C. J. Burton, Christian University, Canton, Mo.

Our Budget.

—All the churches have begun to turn their eyes toward the March Offerlug for Foreign Missions. The Silver Jubilee Year of the Foreign Society will certainly mark a great stride forward in the offerings to evangelize the nations of the earth.

—Christmas seems to have touched an unusual number of our greater rich men and touched them deeper than usual. The papers have noted numerous instances of liberal giving to the poor, to laborers, to libraries and to charitable institutions. One of the largest gifts mentioned is that of James M. Munyon, of Philadelphia. He proposes the establishment of a college for girls and gives two million dollars for a starter. It is to be called Munyon's College for Girls, and to do for them what Girard College is doing for boys. Such princely giving challenges the admiration of every Christian man and woman in the land.

—Our story in the Family Circle this week, entitled Paul Mordaunt, will not fail to be deeply interesting to all. There is more practical Christianity set forth in it in an original way than you will find in a hundred ordinary sermons.

—The Christmas number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is before me. It is a beauty, and most readable and helpful. Your prospectus for 1900 promises many good things. Am glad you have A. McLean for a series of articles. I trust Ernest will follow worthily in your footsteps in his new position on the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST'S staff. We were in Bethany together. Merry Christmas and Happy New Year to you!

Very truly yours,
GEORGE DARSIE, JR.

The above is a sample of the many expressions of appreciation we are receiving in relation to the proposed work of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for 1900. It is good to know that our labor in the Lord is not in vain, and by his help we do not propose that any of our friends shall be disappointed in our record for 1900.

—We know of no church that gets out a more attractive calendar than the First Christian Church of Jacksonville, Florida. It is a beautiful chromo for the wall. A sweet-faced little girl holding her pet dog in one hand and a telephone receiver to her ear with the other. At the head is the name and location of the church, the pastor (J. T. Boone), bulletin of services, an invitation to all to attend, and at the lower left-hand corner a callendar. The colors are bright and the large cardboard bound at top and bottom with brass. The design and beauty of the picture is well calculated to secure a reading of the church bulletin there on. We certainly commend the First Christian Church of Jacksonville, Fla., for its enterprise and good taste in advertising.

—The Outlook Publishing Company, New York, has republished from the Outlook for October 21, the two articles therein on the war in South Africa, tract form, in the Outlook cover, for more general distribution. The article stating the British side of the war was written by the Rev. James Stewart, D. D., and that stating the Boers' side by Geo. W. Van Siclen. To any one who wishes a clear statement of the South African situation as seen from the British and the Boer standpoints we most earnestly commend this tract, which may be had by addressing as above indicated.

—"All About Our Work," is the title of a journal, magazine form, to be the organ of Eureka College and Eureka College Aid Association, recently organized. The first number does credit to its founders and to the college. It is a newsy journal, in good literary dress and attractive cover, and opens with a poem by B. J. Radford entitled, "The Founders of Eureka College." We wish the journal, the Aid Association and the college a Happy New Year and abounding success.

—It is just as we expected. Bro. McGarvey declines to second our motion to "lay on the table, for the time being, all questions pertaining to the legitimacy, the propriety and the danger of higher criticism and devote ourselves for the next few years with single heartedness to study the Scriptures in the light of the soundest learning of the age and—not less important—in the light of our own Christian experience, as we practice its whole teaching, and with the perfect liberty which we have in Christ." The reader will notice that we did not propose to lay on the table real biblical investigation, nor the pointing out of each other's mistakes in trying to come to an understanding of the questions involved in Bible study. The very name "higher criticism" has come to be a stumblingblock to many good people, and it is bound to remain such as long as intelligent brethren are discussing the propriety or impropriety of higher criticism. Who among us would object to a scholarly and reverent investigation of the history of the times in which the various books of the Bible were written, and the literary features of these books, with a view to better understanding of their contents? But that is all that is meant by the phrase "higher criticism" with those who use the phrase intelligently. If mistakes are made, as they have been made, let them be pointed out, of course, by other scholars in the real spirit of truth-seeking. But we had no idea that Bro. McGarvey would agree to our proposition. He even accuses us of a lack of modesty in proposing it.

—Speaking of modesty, how will the following do for a sample:

> These questions appear to him [editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST] of little importance, and I am convinced that this is because he does not understand them and has failed to adequately consider their bearing upon the future of the young and ambitious of both sexes. But I must judge for myself from the broader knowledge which I have laboriously aquired, and not from the narrow and noncommital horizon which bounds his vision. If he were not too advanced in life and too much absorbed in other labors to begin such a task I would make the counter motion that he take up the study of criticism and master it before he advises those who have already done so.

After this no one need be at pains to prove that Bro. McGarvey is superior to the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in the breadth of his horizon and the thoroughness of his mastery of critical problems. Bro. McGarvey himself admits it. But it is not in this admission that Bro. McGarvey's modesty is manifested so much as in the implied claim that he has mastered the study of criticism—a claim which, we venture to suggest, would not be made by any of the distinguished Bible scholars in Christendom. As for ourself, we have never claimed to be more than a layman in the technical questions of biblical criticism. This is one reason why we devote so little space to this subject. Another reason is, we have more vital matters to occupy our time and thought and our space.

—One thing more, and we have done with this unpleasant business. If, during the year to come, we seldom or never refer to anything which appears in the Standard's department of "Biblical Criticism," we beg Bro. McGarvey and his friends to understand that we mean no personal disrespect by it. We simply have better use for our space, as we think, than to engage in a controversy on the class of questions therein discussed. Bro. McGarvey's view of what is legitimate criticism differs very materially from ours. He is at perfect liberty to pursue his method, and we shall exercise the same liberty. Both of us are accountable to God for what we write, but each for himself. "Let us not, therefore, judge each other any more."

—The promised articles on the "Evolution of the Church of Christ," by Prof. J. Fraise Richard, Washington, D. C., began last week and should be carefully read through to the end.

—The person who put an apple in Adam's hand may have put wings on angels.

We wonder how the Register-Review could ever think of permitting one of its correspondents to even hint that the fruit of which Adam partook in the Garden of Eden was as unreal as angel wings, as in the above clipping from one of its columns recently.

—The article by Miss Franklin, of Hurda, India, giving an account of "Protestant Federation in India," will be read with interest, as indicating the growth of the Christian union sentiment in the foreign field. If Protestant federation is a good thing in India, why would it not be an equally good thing in this country, where we have so many gigantic evils to antagonize?

—Here is a letter showing how our liberal special offer of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to churches is being received by our leading churches in the larger cities. This is a rare opportunity for reaching the masses in the church with good literature, and we do not wonder that churches are hastening to take advantage of it:

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I have just read "An Opportunity for the Churches" in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and wish to say, I believe the scheme is practicable and that it should be hailed with delight by all our congregations. Not that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has been offered at too high a price, but that now a larger list of subscribers may be expected in many churches. The only stone of stumbling that I can detect in the road marked out by this plan is the condition that all the papers be sent to one address, instead of going to each through the mails. I will call attention to your excellent offer in the pulpit, and try to get fifty subscribers in my congregation. Wishing the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST great prosperity in the year 1900. I am yours fraternally,
S. T. WILLIS.

—A. L. Drummond, Smith Centre, Kan., writes an earnest article urging the brethren to lay aside all doubtful questions and stick to the gospel. He says:

> When the religious world is awakened to the great necessity of Christian unity; when Mr. Sheldon, of "In His Steps" fame, as a fitting finale to his story, "The Miracle at Markham," has thrown away the old church covenant; when able ministers everywhere are rebelling against creeds and theological dogmas that bind the conscience; when the whole religious world, in fact, is awakening to the beauty and value of that plea for which our fathers so earnestly contended, is it a time for the Disciples of Christ, who have so long plead for these things, to turn aside from the grand purpose of their plea to discuss questions of minor importance. Why is it not better to follow Bro. Richardson's advice in his splendid Jubilee address, when he said: "We shall never be one in our understanding of all Scripture doctrine. Critscism does not point the way to peace and loving fellowship. Opinion must be left untrammeled. . . . . Yet, no man is justified in preaching his peculiar views to the disturbing of Zion's peace. . . Not doubt, but faith, is what the world needs."
> "Talk faith. The world is better off without
> Your uttered ignorance and morbid doubt.
> If you have faith in God, or man, or self,
> Say so; if not, push back upon the shelf,
> Of silence all your thoughts till faith shall come;
> No one will grieve because your lips are dumb."

—J. P. Lucas, of Colorado City, Col., has resigned. The closing sermon was preached before a union audience of all the churches of that city in the Methodist Church. Flournoy Payne has succeeded Bro. Lucas, beginning Dec. 24th. In addition to his pastoral work he will pursue certain studies in Colorado College. Bro. Lucas is open to engagement for evangelistic or pastoral work. Address him at Colorado City. Bro. Lucas was pastor of the mission church in Colorado City for 18 months and resigned because of inadeqnate financial support.

Free for All.

It is only right that we should allow our readers to express their sentiments freely concerning the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and its contents, or concerning any matter of current interest. We are going to open a department of this kind, in which readers will have an opportunity of expressing themselves freely on either side of any proper subject, provided only they write in courteous spirit and limit their contributions to one hundred words. This week we simply give a few extracts from letters, not written as contributions to this department.

I am greatly pleased, barring my own place in it, with the prospectus of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as it appears in your last issue. You have prepared a feast of fat things for your readers, and it ought not to be a difficult matter to increase the circulation largely, despite the competition of lower-priced papers.—W. F. RICHARDSON.

Your club-rate to churches is one of the most liberal and practical ever made. It will be a lost opportunity for doing good to those who do not lay hold upon it. I will present the matter to my church and hope to secure club at once.—THEODORE J. FREED, Terre Haute, Ind.

I congratulate you upon the amicable adjustment of affairs in the Christian Publishing Co., and upon the fact that you are to remain at the helm of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.—J. B. BRINEY, Moberly, Mo.

I pray God's richest blessings to rest upon you in your new lease of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Yours is not an enviable position. You are misunderstood by many, but sometime the mists will roll away.—GEO. L. SNIVELEY, Jacksonville, Ill.

Recently you gave a whole column of things we should be thankful for and left out the very thing of which I thought first—that we still have the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and that it remains under the same editorial control.—MRS. ALEX. PROCTER, Independence, Mo.

I write this to express to you my gratitude for your help to me in the past, and to assure you that not only those who write to you, but a host of others as well will stand by you in your plea for fairness and liberty.—E. S. MUCKLEY, Watertown, N. Y.

I have always found the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST elevated in tone and dignified and uncompromising in its presentation of the truth and always ready to open its columns to fair and impartial investigation.—T. H. BLENUS, Jacksonville, Fla.

I pride myself on being safely conservative, but I have discovered little in your editorials to which I could not give a very hearty attest. Men, like well-ballasted ships, may careen, but they will right themselves I feel to congratulate you on your continuation of the old relation to the paper and its many appreciative readers.—W. H. BAGBY, Salt Lake City.

I do not feel that I can recommend the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST to the members of my congregation. I shall be glad to know there is to be a change in the attitude of the paper, and that all sides of disputed questions shall receive attention by those who are able to discuss them.—W. H. APPLEGATE, McComb, O.

Your special offer to the churches is certainly a step in the right direction. It will be of great value to our strong and wealthy churches.—G. L. BUSH, Windsor, Mo.

I gladly make an attempt to place the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in every home in our congregation. The paper is so full of intellectual and spiritual good health that it brings a flush to one's life to read it.—A. W. TAYLOR, Cincinnati, O.

Your club rates to churches are both timely and liberal. Every congregation among the Disciples of Christ ought to take advantage of this opportunity to greatly increase the circulation of a first class religious journal. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is very cheap, even at the regular rate of $1.50. I have found no one who wishes it for less money.—N. M. RAGLAND, Fayetteville, Ark.

Not only is the Christian Publishing Company to be congratulated that the present editor is to remain at the helm in guiding the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, but the great and growing brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ and the Christian world at large.—J. C. B. STIVERS, Elyria, O.

I know I am a better man for having read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Your Hour of Prayer, Easy Chair notes, etc., contains words of comfort and cheer which are spiritually uplifting.—J. H. MCCORMICK, Coles, Ill.

I do wish the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST would not be so free in its use of the title "Dr.," especially as applied to our own brethren, for to me "Bro. Willett," "Bro. Moore," "Bro. Garrison," is so much more agreeable than "Dr. Willett," etc. Yet neither I nor any one else can read the paper without being made to think, and perhaps that is the thing after all. I am sincerely glad you are to remain in your accustomed place. I will push the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in this church to the best of my ability.—WALTER SCOTT PRIEST, Atchison, Kan.

Your idea of "church clubs" for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is most timely and thoughtful and practical. It will be a most excellent arrangement for all our churches. We will all help push it along.—A. M. HOOTMAN, Tonawanda, N. Y.

Your announcement in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST of Dec. 14th should meet a hearty response from the brotherhood. Here in the East we feel the need of pushing hard for a larger circulation of our literature. You can count on me to help in the matter. Long may you live to push the noblest of all pleas.—M. E. HARLAN, Brooklyn, N. Y.

I am desirous of seeing the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST prosper in its great work. I like an "open-door" policy on all questions, unless liberty be abused to gender strife.—CLINTON LOCKHART.

I want to express to you my deep personal satisfaction and gratitude that you are to continue to be the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I believe it is a great blessing to all concerned that you are to continue to mold the character and direct the policy of the paper, which has always derived from you its distinctive excellence and its worthiest success. Surely, it would have been an unspeakable calamity to the cause which the paper has always advocated, had it changed editors, because of the main issue that was involved in this case.—S. M. JEFFERSON, Berkeley, Cal.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, always in the front ranks of progressive journalism, is to be congratulated upon its one dollar rate to the churches. This offer by one of the best papers in the land now makes it one of the cheapest. THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has always stood for liberty and loyalty, for every righteous reform, and deserves the support of all who believe in its rational policy, its tolerant spirit, its ardent Discipleship.—E. B. BARNES,, Normal, Ill.

The Meeting at Huntington.

We began Oct. 21st and closed Dec. 17th, the greatest revival ever held in the state of West Virginia. The preaching was done by that "prince of evangelists," S. M. Martin. The singing was conducted by the well-known author and eminent musician, J. H. Rosecrans.

It is well known to the brotherhood of Disciples that the church at this place at one time was advertised for sale, and was rescued by the Church Extension and the many friends in the different states. This fact, that the church was saved, has been a kind of thorn in the flesh to many of our sectarian neighbors, and they could only reconcile the matter with their consciences (?) that it was after all providential (?) as a reservoir was needed in the city into which could be dumped the spiritual refuse (?) or the poorer classes that ought not and were forbidden to associate with the "upper crust" of the aristocratic churches, and they were very kind in their aid in thus observing the sentiment of their "little creeds!" When Bro. Martin came his fame and his pictures were scattered in every part of the city, and great multitudes came to see if he looked like his photograph. Among the eminently curious were the preachers of other churches, who for a while seemed really pleased with his style, but——! In the last eight days of the meeting 53 accepted the Christ. The following is a tabulated result of the meeting. From the Methodists, 28; Baptists, 22; Presbyterians, 5; Lutherans, 3; Episcopolians, 1, and the United Brethren, 1. Total, 153. Out of the entire number there were exactly 100 baptisms.

This is not only a victory for the Church of Christ in Huntington, but in the state of West Virginia, before whose hills the Current Reformation was born and in which is the grand old College of Bethany, the home of the Campbells and the birthplace of some of the greatest men in all departments of life's calling.

For this victory, we give God the glory, and yet we must give the honor to the earthen vessel chosen of God, and who did the watering with his great heart of love and earnest devotion, Bro. S. M Martin, the champion of truth and the defender of the "faith once for all delivered to the saints."

Indeed, it may well be said that no one preaches like this man, and all classes hear him gladly. His sermons are gems of literary production, and delivered in such a manner as to be forceful and attractive, and withal most convincing. But this is not all that can and ought to be said of Bro. M. His sweet and Christianly spirit manifested in treatment of those who seek to destroy his name and character is indeed Christlike, and commended itself to friend and foe alike. Truly, his reception of the indignities openly given and his conduct toward those who gave personal affront cannot be too highly praised.

His farewell sermon and instructions given the converts and the "setting in order the the things of the kingdom" was the most helpful and touching of all the meetings. I heartily commend Bro. Martin to all congregations that need bringing out, and are in search for the right man. Our prayers follow him and we shall always look upon him as our Moses under Christ. Thank God for such men as S. M. Martin and J. H. Rosecrans, and let all the churches say, Amen!

Will Not the Churches Help?

Perhaps most of the money of the $100,000 which I hope to secure for the Bible College Endowment will come from individuals. So far nearly all that has been raised has come from individual Christians. But this ought not to be so. There ought to be some way by which churches could be interested as churches in our educational work. Until this is done our success as a religious people will never be commensurate with our great opportunity.

Will not a number of our churches take stock in this Bible College enterprise? And will they not arrange the matter in their financial plan for the coming year? Let the Bible College Endowment Fund have as prominent a place if not the most prominent place of all our benevolent works. The following are some of the ways that may be adopted by the churches:

(1) Let a church subscribe, say $500, $1,000 or $5,000, to be paid in annual installments within five, ten or fifteen years, the amount not paid bearing interest at 6 per cent. until the whole debt is liquidated. This would be equivalent to the notes we are now paying, and would be reckoned as a part of the endowment fund.

(2) Let a church subscribe $100, or as much more as possible, to be paid annually for some definite period. This would help to pay current expenses until the whole endowment fund is secured, but could not be counted as part of the permanent endowment, because not bearing interest.

(3) As a last resort, a collection might be taken in every church for this important work. I have not much faith in a collection of this kind, but it will yield something, and that will be better than to do nothing.

Now, will not the officers of every church in the state reckon the Bible College as part of their financial responsibility for the coming year? Let the matter be brought before the churches if necessary, and let these churches endorse the action of their officers by making a substantial donation to the Bible College at Columbia. Remember, the endowment fund must be secured during the coming year, or else all that has already been accomplished becomes null and void. May I not have the pleasure of hearing from a number of churches in response to this appeal? W. T. MOORE.

PERSONAL MENTION.

Roy Caldwell, pastor at Woodward, Ia., begins a meeting there soon.

We have lately enjoyed pleasant calls from Benj. L Smith, of Cincinnati, corresponding secretary of our American missionary work, and J. B. Briney, of Moberly.

S. T Martin, pastor at Mason City, Ia , is conducting a protracted meeting at Lake City, Ia., and pastor F H. Lemon, of the latter place, is filling the pulpit at the former.

Any one desiring the services of a lady singer for a meeting, at reasonable rates, may be supplied by addressing the pastor of the Christian Church, Blue Mound, Ill.

The official board of the First Christian Church in Paris, Texas, in its meeting last Sunday extended a call to J. N. Crutcher to remain as pastor of the church.

Miss Mary Lyon delivered an address in Findlay, O., recently, to a full house under auspices C. W. B M. It was a fine meeting Nine new members and a good offering. Church work doing finely.

A card from F. E. Blanchard at Barnard, Mo , Tuesday morning, announces the death of his father in North Enid, Okla. Ter. on Dec. 21 Suitable obituary notice will appear in due season.

S. W. Glascock has concluded his work for the church in Rock Port, Mo., and desires to communicate wit any church in need of a pastor. While at Rock Port, one year, 29 were added to the church.

Bro. A. R. Adams who has had charge of the Old Bedford Church for over three years, leaves the church in good condition, and is thereby heartily recommended to any congregation desiring a minister.

The wife of R. A. Omer, who has been treated at the Prime Sanitarium, Springfield, Ill., is now at her home in Camp Point greatly improved. Bro. Omer is to assist J H. Stark in a meeting in Virginia, Ill., in January.

John A. Stevens has resigned his office of corresponding secretary and state evangelist of Mississippi and requests all correspondence relating to those offices addressed to his successor, Elder N. J. Jacks, Jackson, Miss.

F. B Sapp has accepted the pastorate of the Central Church, San Jose, Cal., and will be succeeded in his work as corresponding secretary of the Washington state work by Neal S. McCallum, of Irvington, Ind.

The church in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, seems to be in a prosperous state under the care of J. B. Boen. In nine months' work 139 additions are reported, and all debts ($700) on the church paid. No protracted meeting in the case.

Albert Nichols has been called to serve the church the Lincoln (Ill) Church the third year beginning March 1, 1900. The past two years are said to have been years of steady growth, and the order and peace of the congregation never were better.

L. E. Sellers has resigned the pastorate of the First Christian Church at Emporia, Kan., to accept a call to Terre Haute, Ind. The change will take effect in about two months. The Emporia papers speak in high terms of his work in that city.

H. T Morrison has been sent to Shenandoah, Iowa, by the Iowa state board, to set things in order at that place and revive the church.

Through the assistance of R W. Stancill, Elmer Hollinghead and the nineteenth Ohio district board the church in Bowling Green has reduced its indebtedness from $4,756 to $2 500, and this latter amount it now desires to borrow from the Church Extension Board.

The church in Corunna and in Cedar Lake, Ind , have retained John J. Higgs as pastor for another year, at an increase of salary. Both churches are in a prosperous condition. Bro. Higgs will begin a meeting at Corunna Dec. 31. Bro. C M. Hughes, singing evangelist, will assist in the meeting.

Prof. C. A. Young, of the University of Virginia, preached for the West End Church on Sunday morning and spent hristmas with his mother, in St. Louis County. He came to the city chiefly in the interest of the National C. W. B. M. work, and was not unmindful of this office in his calls before leaving for Chicago.

B. B Tyler, of Colorado Springs, Colorado, is to attend the meeting of the Nebraska Ministerial Assocation, at Geneva, Neb , Dec. 26 28. and is to give five adresses as follows: "Back to Christ in Doctrine;" "The Restoration of Primitive Christianity: How Far Desirable and Practicable;" "The Gospel for the Present Age;" "Books, Reading, Study," and "The Pastoral Epistles: Lessons From."

J. B. Briney and his wife are spending a few days with their daughter. Mrs Sherman B. Moore, in this city Bro Moore is the successful pastor of the Compton Heights Church in this city. Bro. Briney preached for the Compton Heights Church on Sunday and of course made us a call while in the city. He is to hold a meeting for Melancthon Moore, Reserve, Kan., next month.

T. E. A. Sweet, chairman building committee, writes us that the church at Bristol, Tenn., will dedicate a new five thousand dollar house of worship Jan 7, which is a model of beauty and convenience. Bro. F M Rains will have charge of the exercises and the Bristol brethren anticipate a great day in the history of the church at that place. Friends from a distance will be made welcome.

A correspondent, after squaring accounts for the year by a remittance to balance says: "Our city [Mena, Ark] was three years old August 19th and now has a population of 5 000 " This is a remarkable growth for a new inland town. The church there is building a parsonage. Some rivalry among the churches for supremacy is also noted, but we trust this will be duly seasoned with grace.

It is generally supposed that a successful revival meeting cannot be held in a large city just before holidays, but the Compton Heights Church, S. B. Moore, pastor, has demonstrated otherwise. Our city evangelist, A. J. Marshall, assisted them in a three weeks' meeting, recently closed, resulting in 28 additions, besides intellectual, moral and spiritual gains.

Clark Braden, of Alma, Ill., is having things about his own way with Elder White, a Mormon, with whom he debated in Alma in November, but which debate he (White) now refuses to reproduce or repeat in Independence, Mo., as he implied he would in a previous challenge, and as a number of our Illinois preachers have challenged him to do But this does not seem to be White's first "back out" from meeting Clark Braden on a question involving the integrity of the Mormon claims.

The Light-House, the official organ of the Western Pennsylvania Christian Missionary Society of the Christian Church, is on our table. This 20 page (December) number is brilliant in outside covers, printed in patriotic colors—red and blue—which enclose an unusually interesting selection of church and general news. Not least worthy of note among its contents are excellent half-tone portraits of Revs T. N. Eaton, J. Grinstead and M. E. Chatley.

F. M. Kirkham has disposed of his interest in the Pacific Christian to W B. Berry and J. F. Ghormley. This change was necessitated by Dr. Kirkham's continued ill health. It is his intention to go to Southern California for a few months, for complete rest and recuperation. Bro. Ghormley will continue to reside in Portland, Ore., and will conduct a branch office of the Pacific Christian Pub. Co in that city. Bro. Berry will be in charge at San Francisco. While we regret the cause of Dr. Kirkham's retirement, we congratulate the brethren on the Pacific Coast that Bro Berry, who has given such long and faithful service to maintaining a paper in the West, is to become editor of the paper. We wish the Pacific Christian and its editors and owners the largest success.

The Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia

W. W. Weedon, of Williamsville, Ill., writes that he assisted the church at Cowden to dedicate their new house of worship on Lord's day, Dec. 17th. They have a very neat, comfortable building, the best one in the place. Much credit is due to Bro. Bedall and the little band of workers there for the success of this enterprise. About $800, which was sufficient to pay all indebtedness on the building, was raised. The church at Cowden was greatly assisted in the work of building their new house by the good people of Cowden, and vicinity, and especially by the members of the M. E Church, which act we are glad to record.

C. S. Medbury says: "The first district has just suffered loss in the resignation of Bro. Jay O. Rose of Kendallville. A five years' pastorate of unusual strength closes with the church a recognized factor for good in the community and the future bright with promise. During Bro Rose's pastorate there have been 284 accessions to the church, one-third of debt paid and two-thirds provided for in good pledges, four confessions at farewell service. Bro. Rose goes at once to the work at Lebanon, Ind., and the new field is entered with added strength and promise by reason of his marriage, Dec. 13th, to Miss Edith M Fay, a most estimable young lady of Bryan, O. Prof. Fairfield, of Angola, officiated at the wedding. Bro E L. Comer, of Irvington, takes the work at Kendallville, and all rejoice in so wise an arrangement. The district welcomes its new helper."

"Further Information."

DEAR BRO GARRISON:—You are right. All would be safer to "wait for further information," especially when the matter is a newspaper report of a religious discussion. When will our great dailies send to report such discussions men who know at least the alphabet of theological thought? Dr. Foster's paper on "What Constitutes Scripturalness," to which you refer, caused "no small stir" among the Chicago Baptist ministers. And to make the matter worse, some of the ministers present m sunderstood the terms of the paper. The discussion lasted five succeeding Mondays, and it was my privilege to hear the paper and Dr. Foster's final reply to the criticisms upon it. Your newspaper account says, "Prof. Foster, in his paper and in defense of it, declared that he had full faith in all the teachings of the Bible, but he did not believe that the men who wrote the Bible were inspired." Dr. Foster did not only not say this, but he said nothing like it. The fact is, it is the direct opposite of his belief and of his statements in this discussion. In the paper he used the term "illumination" instead of "inspiration," and he defended this change of terms by saying that he was afraid if he used the term "inspired" some one would attach to it a particular theory of inspiration. In reply to the criticisms on his use of the term "illumination" he stated positively that he had no objection to the use of the term "inspired" if it was applied to the men instead of to the book. All the cry in the conference, "I will stand by the Old Book," was just so much misplaced sentiment. Dr. Foster believes and he declared that the biblical writers were "illumined by the Spirit of God," and he distinguished this from the illumination of the eighteenth century by saying that "it was not human but divine illumination"—that "it came, not from the spirit of man, but from the Spirit of God" The whole trouble has grown out of the fact that he did not use a traditional term in the traditional sense. One is reminded of a sentence in the preface of the Authorized Version, "A godly Father [Jerome] in the primitive time reporteth that he was much abused for turning cucurbita into hedera;" or of Dr. Talmage's objection to the Revised Version, that "the Psalms did not sound like they did when they were read to him on his mother's knee." Dr. Foster did criticise some theories of inspiration, but said nothing against the fact of inspiration and nothing that could justly be construed as against the fact. He more than once declared his belief in inspiration, but to avoid misunderstanding he preferred to use the term "illumination." This is the "further information," and it is given in the love of truth and fair play.

The Value of Criticism.

Within the past month and up to this date much has been written in our religious weeklies about "Evangelism," "Pastoral Duties," "Higher Criticism," "Scraps," "Few Words with Young Preachers," etc. The latter subject seems to be a favorite theme with one of our Lone Star State brethren, who expresses his "opinion in regard to the evangelistic methods of advertising among our up-to-date evangelists and pastors." Since he unjustly and without a reasonable cause begins to criticise the writer I have every reason to answer the part I consider sarcastic and unjust. Perhaps some of us young preachers and evangelists need correction for our "new and untried" enthusiastic efforts in our Master's work. We are very much human and apt to mistake and blunder like "other people."

Our advertising methods may not meet with the approbation of some of our older brethren in the ministry. But why should a business-like Christian minister criticise our good motives? Prove all things, hold fast to that which is good, has another meaning with more godliness as a foundation than the imaginative and unkind criticism of our erring brother. Why should any one find fault with the progressive and successful business methods of our evangelists?

It matters not how they advertise as long as they bear in mind the right motive. "God seeth not as man seeth." I have confidence in our "advertising evangelists" for their work's sake. There is no man who is willing to make a greater "living sacrifice" than our aggressive evangelists and preachers. All the praise and comment they receive comes from appreciative churches, societies, communities, newspapers and individuals who feel that they have been blessed and benefited by their feeble efforts. I see no reason why others should become so "envious and jealous" about the praise of praiseworthy evangelists.

Why should any one attempt to offer criticism on our enthusiastic, soul-stiring, self-sacrificing and consecrated evangelists, when souls are perishing and churches are dying for want of evangelistic efforts? Christianity has always been and seemingly it is still suffering hardships and persecution from the ignorance of its friends. Let us remember that the Bible tells all men the same story, and if we fail to tell the truth or substitute some speculative theory in its place, we deserve just criticism by Bros. McGarvey, Briney, Dungan or some other sound teacher of the Word of God. May our Lone Star State brother remember that there is much in—

"Early to bed, early to rise;
Preach the gospel and advertise."

Let us also remember that "now abideth faith, hope and love, these three; and the greatest of these is love," not "fault-finding," nor "criticism."

As we see 1899 passing away let us forget and bury the past, and let the new era of 1900 inspire us to more consecration, loyalty to Christ and his service

URIC ACID

Causes More Diseases in the Human System than Any Other Poison.

To Prove what Swamp-Root the Great Kidney Remedy will do for You, Every Reader of The Christian-Evangelist May Have a Sample Bottle Free by Mail.

Science has demonstrated that in a few days' time you brew enough Uric Acid in your body to produce death

Your kidneys are your only salvation.

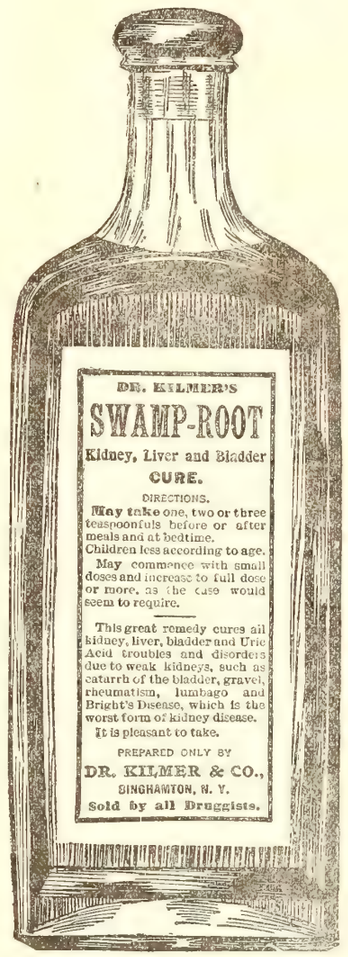
BECAUSE when they are well they filter out this deadly poison.

So when your kidneys are sick, you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected, and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

They are all being slowly poisoned.

Uric Acid starts in the system more different kinds of trouble and suffering than any other form of poisoning. It irritates the nerves, makes you dizzy, restless, sleepless and irritable. Causes rheumatism and neuralgia, pain or dull ache in the back, joints and muscles; makes your head ache and back ache, causes indigestion, stomach and liver trouble; you get a sallow, yellow complexion; makes you feel as though you had heart trouble; you lack ambition, get weak and waste away.

The cure for these troubles is Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the world famous kidney remedy.



It instantly relieves the congested, overworked kidneys, and gradually brings them back to health. In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to nature, for Swamp Root is the most perfect healer and gentle aid to the kidneys that is known to medical science.

Healthy kidneys keep down the excess of uric acid, and you soon feel the benefit in new health and strength.

Swamp-Root should at once be taken upon the least sign of ill health. It will make you well and is for sale the world over in bottles of two sizes and two prices, fifty-cent and one-dollar.

Swamp-Root is used in the leading hospitals; recommended by skilled physicians in their private practice; and is taken by doctors themselves who have kidney ailments, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

To prove its wonderful efficacy send your name and address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., mentioning the St. Louis CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, when you will receive, free of all charge, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a valuable book, by mail, prepaid. This book contains many of the thousands upon thousands of testimonial letters received from men and women cured.

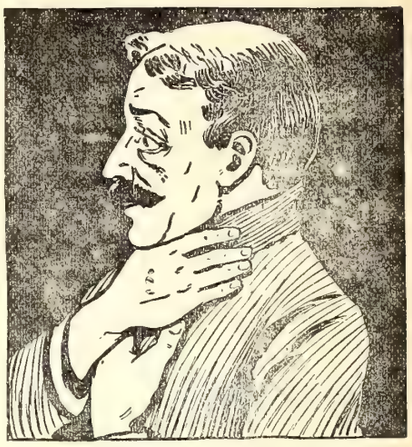
English Topics.

ENGLAND'S ONLY TOPIC.

One all-absorbing topic is filling the hearts of the English with emotion, and the brains of the nation with conflicting ideas. The overwhelming majority of this British community is fiercely anti-Boer, but I am bound to admit that there is a small but very eager minority against this dreadful war. For instance, two of the greatest of London editors have been constrained to resign on account of their pro-Boer sympathies, passionately expressed in their respective organs day by day, until their proprietors would no longer tolerate their course. Mr. Massingham, editor of the Daily Chronicle, led the way by flinging up his post, and he is now this week followed by Mr. Crook, editor of the Echo, the popular and delightful evening paper. I cannot say that either of these gentlemen was justified in continuing to champion the cause of Kruger and the Transvaal oligarchy, in the face of the revelations of the tyranny and corruption of the ring of officials at Pretoria. With the desire for independency on the part of a sturdy kindred race every Briton and every American ought to enter into deepest sympathy; but such men as Dr. Stewart, for thirty years resident in South Africa, ought to know something of the stupendous issues at stake. He is president of Lovedale College, where Kaffir and Zulu evangelists have been trained. His exposure of the despotism of Krugerism is withering. It all comes to this at last, that Britain had to insist on equal rights for English and Dutch throughout South Africa. That is what the typical Boer would never allow, and this is the root-cause of the war. Nearly every living Englishman heartily believes this and hence, terrible though the sacrifices are, the war is being supported by the vast majority. War is hell, and it is the more to be wondered at that the Boers should have fooled with their own destiny by defying a great empire. Dr. Stewart has always said, and he says to-day, that Kruger never meant to make any concessions. I should think that no nation so small and weak ever made such long, vast and costly preparations for war as the Boers have been making. They have for years been determining to have this fight, and now they have got what they wanted, but with certain defeat instead of the certain victory, which in their overweening conceit they had reckoned on. The great dream of Cecil Rhodes will be realized sooner than most people imagined. The Union Jack will float over continuous territory from Cairo to the Cape. What is to my mind most significant is that the native races, even those which have been conquered by us, like us and are loyal to us. This applies to such former foes as the Matabele, the Basutos and the Zulus. These all fiercely hate the Boers, who treat all the natives, not only with contempt, but with cruelty. Ask any one familiar with South Africa. The answer is always the same.

WHEN PEACE SHALL BE RESTORED.

I do not believe in the general notion that the war will be a long one. Our army will gradually become an immense host of about 120,000 soldiers, who will, when once the tide is turned, carry all before them. The ignorant folly of the brave but stupid Boers was shown in their theory that by invading Natal and Cape Colony with a rush, and by taking the English by surprise, they could thus make themselves masters of the situation. Had they been reasonable, and had they not been too arrogant to listen to advice, they would have understood that the cosmopolitan dominion known as the British Empire is growing more and more universally loyal every day and that even if these Transvaal levies could have driven the British forces into the sea, the end would be the same. What is to happen after the war? There will be no more toleration of two petty little mediæval Dutch oligarchies sustaining a sham republicanism. True and genuine democracy will be established under the ægis of the British flag. Cape Colony and Natal enjoy absolute Home Rule. English and Dutch have perfectly equal rights, and the natives are protected, well paid and contented. The Orange Free State and the Transvaal will both lose their independence as separate territories, and will be merged in one grand South African Confederation of five provinces. They will not enjoy less freedom and will have self-government, like all British colonies, but will be compelled to respect the claims of other races besides a few thousand Dutchmen, who have taxed anybody they chose to any extent they pleased, without giving those thus bled the right of vote or protest or voice in any way.



PERSONAL INTEREST IN THE WAR.

Nearly every household in England is being directly or indirectly affected by this cruel and bloody conflict. I have two nephews, the brave, bright boys of my wife's only sister, away with the army in South Africa. One of these has lately gone through the two battles of Dundee and Glencoe, which happened before the seige of Ladysmith. He is a young rifleman and is shut up in Ladysmith with Sir George White's force. The other son is with the cavalry in another part of the field. Think of the anxiety of the widowed mother about her orphan soldier boys! After landing at Liverpool I stayed a day at Chester on my way to London, and at once began to encounter news of the war in thrilling personal details. Friends in Chester told me that one of the reservists who was in a position in trade in that city was called off to go and join the colors of his regiment. He sailed for South Africa and was one of the first to fall on the battlefield in Natal. And a widow and seven children are left weeping his death! Of such incidents we are hearing every day. Can you wonder that the English people have resolved that never shall there be a chance of another Boer war? Of course, the cry is repeated by pro-Boer writers and speakers that this conflict is a mere war of stock-jobbers, and that nothing but the lust for gold is at the bottom of the whole business. Well, it does seem passing strange to me that this parrot argument should be reiterated in face of the historic fact that we and the Boers were in the same sort of trouble long before there was any thought of gold exploitation in the Transvaal, and indeed, long before the Boers trekked to that region. In the early part of this century the Boers excited the wrath of Livingstone for their barbarity to the Kaffirs. The Boers are a good-humored, hospitable, brave, religious race. But they are bigoted, intolerant, unprogressive and oppressive. Briton and Boer will be brothers after this crisis. They have been under the impression that British officers were fools and British soldiers cowards. One after another, Englishmen who have traveled in the Transvaal, have assured me that of late years their experience has been exceedingly uncomfortable. The Boer women have been especially insolent, and they have to a large extent provoked their husbands, brothers and sons to fight.

"CONSPUEZ LA REINE!"

I am ashamed to translate this diabolical French imprecation into English, but I am compelled to quote it and to translate it. It means "Spit at the Queen!" Till now the favorite French imprecation for several years has been "Conspuez Zola!" or "Conspuez Dreyfus!" And hitherto the motto has been, however bitterly our French neighbors might vilify England, "Ne touchez pas a la Reine!" "Let Queen Victoria alone!" And the whole French nation has very gallantly acted on that maxim, until the outlook of the Boer war. Of course, France has a long reckoning against England. It began with Waterloo at the climax of Wellington's victories over Napoleon and his armies, and it has wound up at the end of the century with Fashoda. But not a single offense has been given to France which she has not wantonly and wickedly brought on herself. She is now putting herself in an unspeakably humiliating position. Mr. Chamberlain has considered himself bound to speak out in protest against the shameful caricatures with which the French comic press is insulting Queen Victoria. One of these gutter journals contained a picture of the Queen as a half nude, fat old woman, being scourged by a bestial looking old Boer. Fortunately, one of the nobler type of statesmen happens to be Minister of the Interior. M. Delcasse has ordered all such gross organs to be seized. I note that some of our own English journals cal Mr. Chamberlain to account for his manly and outspoken expostulation. They maintain that there will be danger next of a conflict with our fiery neighbors if they are threatened by anybody in power in England But those who know much of the French understand them better. They unfortunately mistake meek acquiescence for cowardly weakness, and they quickly interpret a vigorous remonstrance as indicating strength and courage which they are bound to respect. And I do not believe that war with France will ever come again. It would simply mean the immediate annihilation of the French navy and the capture of every French colony. I am grieved to say that I fear the coming war will be with another and greater power and with a far nobler people, that is, with Russia. In some future letter I may give my reasons for this fear and for my grief at heart because of such a prospect. W. DURBAN.

43 Park Road, South Tottenham, London, Dec. 9, 1899.

If the man does not stop the cough the cough stops the man; stops his appetite, his sleep, his pleasure and his work. So called "cough remedies" sometimes relieve but they don't go deep enough to cure. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures coughs and diseases of the respiratory organs perfectly and permanently. It stops the cough. It heals the lungs, stops the hemorrhage, if the lungs are bleeding, and by purifying the blood and increasing the action of the blood-making glands enriches every organ with the good blood which alone will make a good body.

"My husband had been coughing for years and people frankly told me that he would go into consumption," writes Mrs. John Shireman, of No. 265 25th Place, Chicago, Ill. "He had such terrible coughing spells, we not only grew much alarmed, but looked for the bursting of a blood vessel or a hemorrhage at almost any time. After three days' coughing he was too weak to cross the room. The doctor did him no good. I stated the case to a druggist, who handed me a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. My husband's recovery was remarkable. In three days after he began using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery he was up and around, and in two more days he went to work. Two bottles cured him."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure biliousness. They produce permanent benefit and do not re-act on the system. One is a gentle laxative, two a cathartic dose.

The Opening Day of Congress.

The Capitol ordinarily has little attraction for the citizens of Washington. A visit to the congressional galleries is apt to prove disappointing The atmosphere of the Senate tends to drowsiness and the confusion on the floor of the House of Representatives is distracting. One does not enjoy sitting for an hour listening to a succession of roll calls, while the legislators who can command the attention of their fellowmembers and interest the galleries are not often heard

But all Washington is interested in the opening session of a new Congress. The day when members-elect are sworn in, new officers chosen, party policies outlined and floral tributes presented by admiring constituents always excites general interest and brings great crowds to the big house on the hill.

The diversion of this opening day affords the tired preacher an enviable opportunity for Monday's recreation, so we find ourselves among the throng filing down the broad avenues to the Capitol. "What is the prospect of getting into the gallery?" "Admission only by card and only two cards allowed each member."

As the average congressman has at least one wife and one private secretary, to say nothing of the children, friends and constituents in the city, the chances seem slim. We happen to meet on the floor of the House Hon. James T Lloyd, of Missouri who, with his excellent wife, are frequent attendants at the Ninth St. Christian Church, and who is, by the way, one of the cleverest men and best representatives in Congress. Mr. Lloyd kindly provides for Bro. Ira W. Kimmel and myself choice seats in one of the galleries.

As we look around the galleries, filled with ladies in brilliant costumes, we are reminded of an expression in Mark's account of the feeding of the five thousand: "And they sat down in ranks," or as the word means, "a garden bed," "a parterre of flowers." Now here are the colors more brilliant than in the diplomatic gallery, for mingled with the richly dressed ladies of the foreign embassies can be seen the the gorgeous costumes of the Chinese and Corean ministers and their secretaries.

It evident that the women are out to-day in force. I have never before seen so many of the fairer sex within the walls of the Capitol.

It is not hard to guess the cause of their presence It is to emphasize the nation's protest against Roberts, the polygamist. The women have felt that this was their fight. The sancity of the home was in jeopardy. They are determined that the representative of this most pernicious system shall never be counted a member of our highest legislative assembly.

The scene on the floor of the House reminds us of college days The old boys have returned and are shaking hands and slapping each other on the back, exchanging jokes and relating experiences of the vacation. The grey haired men are the Seniors and the new members the Freshmen, and all mingled together in delightful intercourse. I find myself watching the door for the big form of the Master to come in and rap on the desk and call the school to order. But the Master doesn't come, for he is in New York, practicing law now, and the school is to have a new teacher. There are others besides the late speaker who are missed. I find myself looking in vain for some of my old friends of the fifty-third Congress. Benton McMillan, "the Chesterfield of the House," is now governor of Tennessee; Wm. L. Wilson, the brilliant and scholarly prsidenet of Washington and Lee Universities; Jere Simpson, "the sockless statesman," who deserved this soubriquet with "sockless" left out; Dockery, of Missouri, and Sayers, of Texas, who can be depended upon to prevent extravagant appropriations in their respective states; Andrew J. Hunter, of Illinois, an able representative and a true and tried disciple of the Lord Jesus; Thos. W. Phillips, happy in the Industrial Commission, for which he labored so ardently; Tom Johnson, of Ohio, preaching Single Tax and looking after his railroads; Richard Bland and Nelson Dingley, men who served well their country and have gone to their reward. The retirement of the giants of those days only serves to make room for the new giants who in turn give proof of their strength.

My companions are interested especially in our own brethren in Congress. I point out Champ Clark, the stalwart member from Missouri. The Congressional Directory tells us that "he was educated in the Kentucky University, Bethany College and Cincinnati Law School, and that he has worked as a hired hand on a farm, clerked in a country store, edited a country newspaper and practiced law." Then there is John M. Allen, of Mississippi, better known as "Private John Allen, the wit of the House," and James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, the minority leader. William Graham, statesman, philanthrophist, reformer and Sunday school superintendent. E. D. Crumpacker, the distinguished judge of Valparaiso, Ind., and Samuel J. Pugh, the staunch Disciple and able representative from the ninth Kentucky district.

Our attention is now drawn to a procession of men filing into the chamber with huge rolls which they deposit in the area in front of the speakers desk. There are twenty-eight of these rolls, which are said to contain the signatures of seven million people who thus protest against the seating of Mr. Roberts.

The hands of the big clock under the reporters' gallery are pointing to the hour of noon, the mace is lifted in its place as Clerk McDowell calls the House to order. The members arise and reverently stand while the blind chaplain pronounces an impressive and appropriate invocation. The installation of the newly elected speaker is an impressive spectacle, a committee consisting of Messers. Richardson, Bell and Newlands retire to the lobby, and after a few moments the door of the main entrance swings open and Gen. Henderson enters upon the arm of Mr. Richardson, followed by the other members of the committee.

They move slowly down the aisle as the members on either side arise. When they reach the speaker's desk Mr. Richardson presents the new presiding officer amid loud applanse from both sides of the House.

After the speaker's inaugural address, in accordance with the time-honored custom, the oldest member of the House in point of service, Mr Harner, of Pennsylvania, administered the oath of office to Mr. Henderson.

The speaker in turn proceeds to administer the oath to the members who present themselves in groups of twelve or more There are two exceptions to this rule, Representatives Butler and Brosius, who are Quakers and object to taking the oath, appear apart from their colleagues when the word "affirm" is substituted for "swear." The other case is that of Utah, which the clerk called separately. There was intense excitement when the name of Roberts was called Representative R. W. Taylor, of Ohio, arose and said, "I object to the swearing in of the representative-elect from Utah and to his taking his seat The moments that followed were trying ones for the alleged polygamist.

Mr Roberts is a man of fine appearance and stood in an aisle facing the speaker's desk, his hands nervously clasping the brass finishings upon the desk on either side. The eyes of some ten thousand people were upon him as Mr. Taylor used such expressions as "he pleaded guilty to the crime of unlawful cohabitation;" "he has been and is now a polygamist;" 'he is ineligible to be a member of this House, both because of statutory disqualifications created by the Edmunds law and for higher and graver reasons." And also which Mr McRae, of Arkansas, from the Democratic side, said. "He is a polygamist, and his election is an assault upon the American home, an effort to degrade American womanhood and to destroy the sacred marriage relations."

The speaker then requested Mr Roberts to step aside, which he did, saying that he wished to waive none of his rights in so doing I heard the following day the speech of Mr Roberts in his own behalf, and it impressed me as a lame defense. I noted particularly that he did not deny the charge that "he had been and is now a polygamist." The House by a vote of 247 to 59 refused him permission to take the oath of office until an investigation should be made, and a committee was appointed for this purpose. If the charges are substantiated not ten men will be found to vote to allow him to take his seat in Congress.

The election of officers of the House being next in order, Mr. Grosvenor proposed the names of the Republican caucus nominees and Mr. Hay the names of those selected by the Democrats. Among the latter Mr. Richardson, a good Disciple from Murfreesboro, Tenn., was the candidate for speaker: Henry Mohler, whose wife is a member of the Vermont Avenue Church, of this city, the candidate for doorkeeper; E. V. Brooksuire, whose wife is a member of a Christian Church in Indiana, candidate for sergeant at arms, and the pastor of the Ninth St. Church candidate for chaplain. Unluckily for them there was a majority of thirteen or more on the other side. When the vote was announced a lady sitting by me said. "Who is elected chaplain?" "Mr. Conden," I replied.

"O," she said, "I am so glad" "Madam, said I, "I am very sorry" "I am glad because Mr. Conden boards where I am stopping" "And I am sorry because I am the defeated candidate."

After a spirited depate on the adoption of rules for the government of the House Mr. Gardner of New Jersey announced the death of Garret A Hobart, vice-President of the United States, when the House, out of respect for his memory, adjourned So ends the first day of the fifth sixty Congress, a session destined to be memorable in the annals of our history.

"PROTESTANT FEDERATION IN INDIA."

It is proposed to establish a Federation of Protestants in India, with a view to defending the "faith once delivered to the saints."

The proposed basis is as follows: (1) Acceptance of the Bible as the sole standard of authority in faith and practice. (2) Acceptance of the Lord Jesus Christ as the sole Mediator, Redeemer and High Priest of Christians. (3) Acceptance of the completed sacrifice of Calvary as the sole ground of hope for sinners The constitution to be undenominational and unsectarian.

The objects of the Federation are to bind together in brotherly love all real Christians in India, Burmah and Ceylon; to afford a means of opposing all ritualism in the Established Church, all rationalism and Sabbath desecration in society, all undue influence of Romanism in the state.

The weapons of warfare to be, not carnal, but spiritual, and to consist mainly of sermons, addresses, lectures, letters to the press, tracts and booklets

To carry out this object it is desired to establish a central council of not less than 100 members; and committees at Rangoon, Calcutta, Bombay, Madras and Colombo, which shall be in touch with one another and in constant communion with each other and with local committees.

All Christians are invited to help establish this association and to offer any suggestions

The Rev. Dr. Valentine, of the Medical Missionary Training School, Agra has consented to act as secretary pro tem All communications addressed to the undersigned or to Dr. Valentine will be thankfully received.

Brethren, the times are evil, and evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived; wherefore, gird up the loins of your mind, quit you like men; be strong, show yourselves valiant for the truth, and ready to earnestly contend for the faith delivered unto you.

Yours faithfully,

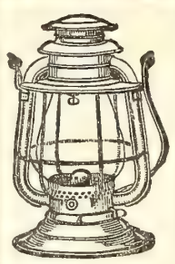
ALFRED PORCELLI,
Colonel R. E.

Agra, Sept. 30, 1899.

The above article appeared in the Bombay Guardian of Oct. 21. It sent a thrill of joy through the heart of every disciple of Christ in India and particularly to us who, from our enlightenment, can read the signs of the times. Heretofore the missionary work in India has been a work of faith. Some of the earlier missionaries in their zeal and despair committed errors which later comers have striven to overcome. The people of India are extremely reserved and distrustful of missionary labors. The earlier missionaries appealed to the native greed, and paid them to be taught. Now many of them have an idea that to become a Christian means a life of ease and luxury. We are trying to teach them that it means instead a life of sorrow and trial, often that of an outcast from their own brethren. It makes them less eager to rush into the new religion, but more steadfast afterward.

The work now and for years past has been that of seed-sowing. The people at home have not understood this, and have often been at a loss to understand the small results of so much labor. This past summer I have been among missionaries of all churches. They nearly all tell the same story. Their home boards are dissatisfied with their reports. I would that those at home were more content to let the seed sowing go on, rather than to despise the day of small things. Surely, one Christian thoroughly trained to all good works, and steadfast in the faith, is worth more than thousands unprepared, only to slip back into idolatry at the first temptation.

India is a land wholly given to idolatry. Never did the Moabites and Ammonites teach a worship more foul and depraved. True, they do not offer human sacrifice and compel their children to go through fire. It is not their religion that restrains them, but a wholesome fear of the English Government. Now and then fanaticism overcomes their fear, and we have small rebellions and outrages that are quickly crushed. On every high hill and under every green tree the images bear testimony to the degradation of the people As the religion is, so will the people be. If I wrote some of the things that are seen in public places here, I should be imprisoned for violating the mail laws! Hindi literature cannot be translated, because the English race will not tolerate such obscenity in print.



Yet there are signs of better times. Two years ago the land was wasted by a famine so terrible that all the world was moved with compassion. Now the land is again devastated by a famine more general and more severe than the recent one. If the winter rains come it will be short; if not, terribly prolonged. There is no physical reason why the rains should fail here. We must look deeper for a cause. To the stricken people there is no explanation. Their gods are unmoved by their entreaties. So also in olden times, the idolatrous Jews saw no reason for their famines and plagues. Only the prophets who saw in the light of faith knew why it was. In the light of faith we can see the hand of God in history and see the cause of India's suffering. The Egyptians could not understand those terrible plagues visited on them. Now we wonder at the infinite Wisdom which so directed the plagues against the Egyptian gods and taught the blind worshipers their helplessness. So the future ages may point out how he turned the Hindus away from their false gods to the God of love and truth.

Equally significant is the above article. Workers on the mission fields who come from denominational churches are finding themselves baffled at every turn by educated men who pick their creeds and philosophies to pieces. Nothing but the Eternal Truth can endure their searching criticism. In their perplexity the missionaries are turning toward that truth, and seeking it anxiously. It seems to us now that we are on the verge of a movement similar to that begun in Virginia fifty years ago, with this exception, that some of us understand whither it is tending as the early Reformers did not and could not know. But we are all young people and untried. We are looking anxiously toward the homeland, for we feel our unfitness to stand before these veterans and teach them the way. Oh, that we had a dozen men whose heads are gray, and whose lives are rich with such experience to help us! We earnestly solicit the prayers of all the churches, and also for material aid in shape of tracts, sermons, addresses, and so forth. Will all those who feel the importance of this crisis send to Bro. McLean subscriptions for this aid? We shall soon meet in a general convention, especially to consider this matter, and strengthen ourselves for the work. The convention will probably be at Jabbalpur, C. P. Whatever may be the outcome, we know God will abundantly bless this movement.

Religious Journalism at Beanville.

Beanville, mo dec 21, 1899.

The ferst ishoo ov the Beanville Banner, a new relidjus weakly, to be speshully devoted to the defence ov the bible agenst hire krittysizzum and to inawgarrate a crewsade agenst colledges and hire eddycation, will soon be distriobertid to the expecktunt publick onless sumthin happens to prevent it.

Let me say, rite here, that I have no conneckshun with this enterprise. The report, sirkulated by sum spiteful enemy, that I wuz to be wun ov the edditers, has dun me considrabul harm, awlreddy, and I dont want the roomer to go enny ferther.

The consepshun of this new jernelistick enterprise okkerred this way: Wun evenin, last weak, I wuz invited to spend the evenin with bruther Wilson. I went over, and when I got there, I found severil uther brethrun thare befoar me. Amung them wuz bruther Jeremiah Watkins, ov Wayback, who has long bin wun ov the most perfuse riters fer the Heptografick Revu, bruther Joshua Richards, Mud Creek, and sevril members ov the Beanville cherch.

After we had set thare awhile, talkin about crops, and the wether, and the war in the Fillypeens, and so forth, bruther Wilsun cleered his throte, and annownsed the perpose ov the meetin:

"I hav called you together brethrun," he sez, "to talk counsell az to what should be dun in this crysis wich confrunts our cause," he sez. "Fer sum time," he sez, "the waves ov hire krittysizzum and modern skeptysizzum," he sez, "haz bin rollin hire and hire," he sez. "Things haz gone from bad to werse," he sez, "until at the prezzent time," he sez, "menny of thoze whom we hav hithertu esteamed az werthy of confidense and trust hav lost all shaime, and recklissly admit that they do not in awl things beleeve jest az they did therty yeres ago," he sez. "Alass fer the dejenerasy ov our times," he sez. "There is sum communytys," he sez, "whare the opinyuns bleeved and taut at Lecksingtun are no longer acsepted az final awthority in a argument or diskushun," he sez. "Werst ov awl," he sez, "the cheef bullwark agenst theze unrychus inflooenses haz broken down," he sez. "Perfesser Megarvy," he sez, "whom I hav lookt to az the sole hoap of a beleegerd awtherdocksy," he sez, "has hizself suckummed to the seducktiv arts ov infidelaty," he sez. "Only recently," he sez, "perfesser Megarvy publickly prazed and endorsed a artikel by perfesser Willit, wich iz the cheefest among hire kritticks and the wun awltogether hettrydocks," he sez, "This defeckshun of perfesser Megarvy and the Chrischun Standerd" he sez, "leeves us without a nusepaper wich can be trustid. Sumthing must be did," he sez, "and did imegitly."

Thare wus considrabel more talk along the saim line. Bruther Jeremiah Watkins wuz strong in expressin the bleef that a new jernel must be startid to wunst. He offered to sackryfize his own feelins and taik eddytoreal charge ov the paper, wich he wuz the moar willin to do, seein that the Heptografick Revu wuz no longer red by ennybody.

After much talk a stock cumpenny wuz orginized, rite then and thare, to begin the publicashun of the Beanville Banner. I took no part in the discushun, and deklined to subskribe fer enny stock, statin that I feered the effect that the posseshun of large welth mite have on me, and dared not run the risk ov gettin rich out ov the proffits ov the Beanville Banner Publishin Cumpenny.

The saim evenin a number of important matters wuz desided. The Direckters ov the new publishin cumpenny set the subskripshun prise ov the paper at $1.50. This iz the prise wich will be publisht, and wich sum unsuspecktin suckers may pay. The publishers will privitly instruckt their agents to taik what they can git, when they cant git $1 50.

Bruther Watkins propozed a skeme fer boostin the serkulashun ov the new jernel. He thot it wood be a good plan to giv each subskriber sum souvyneer or prize. After much diskushun, the direckters desided on a medel, fore inches in diameter, maid ov pure brass. The medel will bare a pickchoor ov bruther Watkins, the edditor, and over this the werds, "He done it." Bruther Watkins thinks this skeme will shurely sekure 50,000 new subskribers inside of 90 daze.

The Beanville Banner Publishin Cumpenny will awlso ishoo a serees ov sunday skule supplize. The direckters, az wun man, agreed that it maid their blud run kold to even think ov the possybility ov the deer children sendin their munny to uther publishin houses fer supplize. To fasillitate this branch ov the biznis, they prepared the follerin sercler, wich will be sent immegitly to awl sunday skule teechers and werkers:

Beanville, mo, jan 1 1900.

DEER, SWEET FREND:

Fer sum time past thare haz bin a growin feer in our harts that you mite order yore sunday skule supplize from sum uther plase than the Beanville Banner Publishin Cumpenny. At this time, when modern skeptysizzum iz maskeradin under the naim of skolership, it iz the sollum dooty ov thoze who are responsibul fer the instruckshun ov the yung to bewear ov pernishus litrytoor, and to order their supplize direct from us. We congrachulait our grate brutherhood that we and our house hav remained true and stedfast, tho awl uther deelers in sunday skule supplize hav terned hettrydocks. We shivver and trembel when we think ov the sickenin results wich iz sertin to foller the perchasin of supplize ennywhere elce but in Beanville. In our disintrested, ingenuous way, we pleed with you to see that yore munny orders, checks and drafts are maid payabel to the Beanville Banner Publishin Cumpenny. We ernestly trust you will join with us in prezentin sich a determined frunt to the forses ov hire krittysizzum and the publishers ov uther sunday skule supplize, that the latter will have to go out ov biznis.

JEREMIAH WATKINS,
JOSHUA RICHARDS
SAMUEL HANKINSON
SALLIE AMMYSON.

I haddent bin takin mutch part in the biznis ov the evenin, but when bruther Watkins had ritten this sercler, and red it to the uther direckters, I cooddent rezist brakin in:

"Brethren," I sez, "what do you spoze iz goin to be the impreshun maid on the deer brutherhood by them serclers!" I sez. "Dont you think," I sez, "that the intellex ov the deer brutherhood is suffishuntly hefty," I sez, "to perseev the reel motiv ov yore littel skeme," I sez, "and catch on to the fackt that yore appeals and yore pleedin and yore tremblin iz fer revenoo only?" I sez.

"Nary," sez bruther Watkins. "When the deer brutherhood reeds them serclers, it will immegitly conseev ov the Beanville Banner Publishin Cumpenny az standin ferm groundid fer the Lord and his cause," he sez, "and will feel in dooty-bound," he sez, "to send their munny fer supplize to us," he sez, "that we may be inkurridged in our nobul werk," he sez, winkin hiz left eye at bruther Richards.

"Maybe," I sez, "and maybe not. Enny man who would be fooled by that sercler," I sez "wood be a brite and shinin mark fer a confidense game," I sez. "If I wuz in the biznis of sellin gold bricks," I sez, "or wuz tryin to ern a honist livin by playin three kard monty," I sez, "I wooddent ask fer no eezier kustummer than him," I sez. "You brethrun are, persunelly, my frends," I sez, "and it iz my dooty to be plane and frank with you," I sez. "You know az well az can be," I sez, "that thare has never bin enny hire krittysizzum or hettrydocksy in cash ov the sunday skule supplize wich you are [illegible]" I sez, "and the deer brutherhood, for wich you show sich tender solissytood know the saim thing," I sez "You wont find enny body mutch," I sez. "Thoze who read them serclers," I sez, "will immegitly conclood that enny tremblin wich iz bein dun by thoze whuze names iz sined to the serclers iz not caused by enny reel feer fer the welfair ov the cause," I sez, "but is caused by yore angzyety to get hold ov the dollers wich are ropozin in the pockits ov the aforesed deer brutherhood," I sez.

Bruther Watkins wuz sertin, however, that the publick wuz eezy to werk, and that it wooden suspect nuthin, and it wuz desided to send out the serclers. I am layin low and sayin mity littel about the new publishin enterprize, but I am havin lots ov fun, when I get oph by myself, laffin over the hole thing. Moar anon. Hillairously yores,

HEZEKIAH HOBSON.

The New Botanic Cure for Kidney, Bladder and Rheumatic Diseases—A Wonderful Discovery.

Disorders of the Kidneys and Bladder cause Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Gravel, Pain in the Back, Bladder Disorders, difficult or too frequent passing of water, Dropsy, etc. For these diseases a Positive Specific Cure is found in a new botanical discovery, the wonderful Kava-Kava shrub, called by botanists, the piper methysticum, from the Ganges River, East India. It has the extraordinary record of 1,200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly on the Kidneys and cures by draining out of the Blood the poisonous Uric Acid, Urates, Lithates, etc., which cause the disease.

Hon. R. C. Wood, a leading attorney of Lowell, Ind., cured of Kidney and bladder disease, writes: "I am now 55 years old and have used various kinds of medicines. For the past ten years I have suffered from rheumatism and liver trouble and have also suffered from kidney and bladder trouble for the past five years. I have been treated by our home physicians and by three different specialists, besides having used various so-called specifics without receiving the least benefit. My bladder trouble became so troublesome that I had to get up from five to twelve times during the the night to urinate. In fact, I was in misery the whole time and was becoming very despondent. I have now used Alkavis and am better than I have been for five years. I know Alkavis will cure bladder and kidney trouble, and can most heartily recommend it to all sufferers. I feel so grateful to you that I feel I owe it to you to write you this. Wishing you the success you deserve, I am, Respectfully yours,

R. C. WOOD.

Rev. W. B. Moore, D. D., of Washington, D. C., testifies in the Christian Advocate, that Alkavis completely cured him of Kidney and Bladder Disease of many years' standing. Many ladies, including Mrs. C. C. Fowler, of Locktown, N. J., and Mrs. James Young, of Kent, Ohio, also testify to its wonderful curative powers in Kidney and other disorders peculiar to womanhood. That you may judge of the value of this Great Discovery for yourself, we will send you one Large Case by Mail Free, only asking that when cured yourself you will recommend it to others. It is a Sure Specific Cure and cannot fail. Address, The Church Kidney Cure Company, 403 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

St. Louis Letter.

In compliance with oft-repeated requests, from many quarters, the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST will supply its readers with St. Louis, news relative and absolute, direct and indirect, specific and general, personal and collective, secular and religious, social and political, industrial and commercial, historical and prospective, for the year 1900. This we would have done before but for our limited space and that scriptural admonition to prefer another in honor. We have not more space now, but shall ask Chicago, New York, Kansas City, Washington, D. C., and London to share with us, during the coming year. St. Louis, as well as the cities named, has happenings, interests and prospects that are of equal importance to our readers; then, besides, it is the home of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

The geographical location of St. Louis has never yet been duly appreciated. It is the metropolis of as large if not the largest area of agricultural lands to be found in the world, and will sooner or later force its way to almost the head of the list of the great cities of this continent. It is now near the three quarter million mark in population, and the World's Fair to be held here in 1903 will easily place her beyond the million mark. Its growth in wealth is equally marked. St. Louis is destined to become a city of great wealth, and with wealth all the concomitants, good and bad, of a large, wealthy city.

A feature of this city not generally known or noticed is that the land on which it stands, including the county, is almost an island. Save a very narrow neck in the southwest corner, St. Louis County is surrounded by three rivers; on the west and north the Missouri, on the north and east the Mississippi and on the south the Maramec. The land within this radius in some places rises several hundred feet above the water in either of the rivers named and is unsurpassed for healthful, pleasant suburban residences. St. Louis, among other features of greatness, is, therefore, destined to become renowned for its pleasant surroundings, romantic hills and delightful residences. And some of her present citizens may yet see the great ships of commerce plying between Chicago and New Orleans by way of her wharfs.

But it is of the moral and religious conditions and currents that we wish to speak more particularly, from time to time, and doubtless of which our readers most desire to read; or at least upon which they most desire information.

Just now St. Louis is in the midst of her semi-religious celebration of the birth of Christ. Everybody is more or less imbued with the divine spirit of love and good will, and consciously or unconsciously preaching this blessed dual gospel. What a glorious thing if the Christmas spirit and atmosphere could prevail throughout the year! How many fountains of tears it would dry up! How many hungry, naked and sick people would be relieved! How many quarrels, fights and suicides and murders would be prevented! What love, fraternity, fellowship and colabor would prevail among the churches, and best of all, what improvement in the use of wealth would come about! But even for a short season happiness at floodtide is a good thing. Along the streets, everywhere, and from the window of almost countless homes gleam the tokens of joy and gladness. Faces are aglow with radiance and hearts are light as at no other season of the year.

Yes, there is superstition mixed up with our present Christmas celebration methods, but thank the Lord, it is of the harmless sort, as a rule, and the tendency is not toward darkness but light on this great, world-wide, unifying custom. More and more will the Christ-spirit prevail, enlighten and elevate this happy, joy-joyful, and now probably permanently fixed season and custom. And so we present St. Louis fo you in this our initial letter in her joyful Christmas mood, that you may be the better prepared for what we may hereafter relate in this column concerning her and our churches and preachers therein, as stated.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

"The care of any school" rests on the servant that moves among them, but with all their burdens, cares and difficulties, they are friendly and ready to help those who are not so well conditioned as themselves. Such is the case at Stewartsville; they promised help, and now, in a most needy time, it is here.

Lawson was my destination Thanksgiving; the weather made against us, but the apportionment came just the same. E. G. Gantz is still with them, having done them such remarkably successful work.

Freedom, Howard, now has a home department. Stanberry is also prosecuting the same good work, and if the school only realized its great benefit, there would be more doing the same thing. We ought to be in the front in such work, not rear. The Ashland brethren were over in numbers to lend a hand, making their second payment to our work at the same time. Can we help any of the schools in the home department work? If so, now is the time, and if you close for the winter, then by all means inaugurate the home department. Write for cards.

The Pleasant Green Howard school and Jas. Gibbs are struggling for life, and K. W. White and his good wife are doing all in their power to assist them. A few gave an offering to our work.

Bro. Giddens has just closed his work at Papinsville with good results, money raised, the Presbyterian Church purchased, the brethren happy, and another house to the credit of state Bible-school work—nine for the year. Notwithstanding his bad health, John Giddens stays with the work, and the friends ought to remember him for it.

Hendrickson writes for help and Brother Elmer Shepard is now arranging to revive and strengthen them. W. H. Stovall writes for assistance at Russ, and M. H. Wood will go to them as soon as possible.

Two Mile, Montgomery, Kearney and Edgerton, send their apportionment with words of cheer. Their help enables us to reach communities like the above and we will gladly so use it. Wish such friends as H. C. Clare, W. T. Wilkerson and C. F. Chrisman would multiply mightily.

The Central of this city and also the First are among our large contributors whose help just at this time is appreciated. The $50 from each will go a long way on this month's salaries. Thanks to J. Q. McCanne and F. P. Grant.

Prof. H. M. Hamill, the field secretary of the international B. S. association, in an address before the Bible-school union of this city, emphasized his wish that all would speak of the school as Bible-school, something we have been doing this long time.

J. J. Lockhart preaches at Holliday, and is in the front as one of our friends, and the Holliday brethren more than met the apportionment.

Southern California Notes.

The policy of our Southern California board this year is to strengthen the weak and struggling churches, rather than to plant others to be be left to themselves to die. The board has thus made it possible for several of these to secure good pastors, who are not only enabling them to live, but are rapidly bringing them to a condition of self support.

Bro. H. E. Ward is in a good meeting with the Eighth Street Church, Los Angeles, and already some fruitage is apparent. He will probably locate with this church, which means "expansion" for this band of faithful workers.

Bro. O. H. Derry is storming the fort at Nordhoff, his own church. He has been there but a short time, but he has already greatly endeared himself to that people. We expect good results there.

At Santa Paula the brethren are looking forward to a new house of worship in the near future. They have a good lot and a portion of the money subscribed. Bro. J. F. Stewart is pushing the work there.

The writer is just closing his fifth year with the church at Ventura. We have about 115 members, well organized in all branches of work. The great need here is a house of worship. This we hope to get the coming year. Two or three years of severe drought has greatly retarded our work, but now with the return of rain we hope for more prosperous times and all our work move forward with great strides.

Our churches in Southern California were never better manned than at present. The preachers are an intelligent, consecrated body of men and are generally doing good work, often at great personal sacrifice. At our monthly ministers' meetings good reports come up from all parts and words of encouragement are heard from many faithful workers.

Notes and News.

A Word from New York.

B. Q Denham was formally installed as pastor of the 56th Street Church of Disciples in New York last Monday evening, and a sermon from his pen with biographical sketch and portrait will probably appear soon in the Treasury of Religious Thought, published by E. B. Treat, 241-243 W 23rd St. Mr Treat is also the publisher of numerous valuable contributions of books in line with subjects treated in his magazine, which is devoted to the general interests of evangelical Christianity. Of these he has recently presented a number of copies to the Sunday school library of the 169th St. Church, of which S. T. Willis is the pastor. They are as follows:

1. "Home Culture," a quarto of 672 pages, a valuable compilation in the form of questions and answers in the various departments of education.

2. "Curiosities of the Bible," an 8vo of 610 pages. This is a most valuable aid in the study of the Bible by its numerous classification of subjects and abundant Scripture references.

3. "Anniversary and Religious Thoughts for the Occasion," a compilation of general information for Young People's Societies.

4. "Patriotic and Secular Thoughts for the Occasion."

5. "Great Joy," sermons and prayer-meeting talks, by D. L. Moody.

This publisher has also just issued an interesting volume for the times consisting of lectures delivered in the Calvary Baptist Church, by its distinguished pastor, Dr. R. S. McArthur. It is a defence of the Bble against the assaults of modern rationalists. Its title is "The Old Book and the Old Faith."

A Church Building Syndicate.

The Chicago Christian Missionary Society is forming a church building syndicate by securing persons who will make the following pledge: "I hereby promise to pay to the treasurer of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society or order the sum of five dollars each time a church is erected by or under the direction of said society in the city of Chicago or county of Cook."

This is a permanent loan fund, to be paid back into the treasury of the society, to be loaned again and again for the building of new churches in this great city. The conditions stipulated are such as to guarantee the donor that the money will be judiciously handled and that each payment will insure a new church building. The entire expense of handling this fund is borne by the society, so that every cent contributed to the loan fund goes for the purpose for which it is given, and with interest returns to be loaned again.

Those who are acquainted with the work in the great cities know the difficulty of housing new churches when real estate is so expensive. This syndicate gives those who will an opportunity to help equip these churches for work.

There is no better nor surer investment that one could make of his money for the Lord's service than in this loan fund. This syndicate commends itself to business men and men and women of business sense.

I hope that there are many outside the city who will join us in this united effort to help our mission churches to build. Once they are in their own house success is assured. If you will join us in this grand work in this great world-center, please send your name to our treasurer, Carl Bushnell, Chamber of Commerce Building, Chicago. E. W. DARST,

State Mission Notes.

I don't know how many readers of the papers ever pay any attention to these notes, but they are such in importance that every lover of Missouri ought to read them and get so full of the facts that it will send us all to our knees, praying for a revival of interest in our work. I am afraid that we are becoming satisfied with what we have done; that we have talked about our growth and our greatness till we have come to the verge of self-conceit, and if we can find that which will make us restless and dissatisfied it will be all the better for us. We NEED TO PRAY,

Lord, increase our discontent. Pray it in earnest. The Register-Review has kindly offered the issue of January 4 as the state mission paper. Certainly, we appreciate such kindness of our friends who thus come to our assistance. This will come out just in time to be of service for which, by the recent action of the state board, has been changed back again to the original month, January. It was found to be utterly impossible to get ready for the collection in November; it was too soon after the conventions, state and national, when the people have been pushed to the limit in the way of collections. Remember, therefore, that is the day on which we want all the churches in the state to make an effort to raise their apportionment for state missions. Will the assistant corresponding secretaries get into correspondence with all the preachers and churches in their territory and endeavor to secure this fund? We must make this year's work the best we have ever had. The

STATE MISSION DAY,

JANUARY 14, 1900,

is coming to our state, and when the reports are read that Missouri has the largest membership of any state in this Union it must also be read that she has the best state mission work of them all. Our state pride ought to move us to work and give as never before. Will we do it?

I published an appeal for help to sustain my man in Southern Missouri. Last week I wrote a personal letter to some of our staunch friends, and the returns have been happy so far. I asked each to subscribe for one month's work $15, and D. O. Smart, J. H. Allen and R. D. Patterson have responded, God bless them. Besides these I have $2 from W. H. Sykes at Frankford and $1 from a sister at Independence. I thank God for this response, but we must have enough to keep him in the field till next October.

Now, then, for the great rally for state missions in the month of January, 1900. Let us begin the last year of the old century with a determination that it shall be the best of the whole hundred. Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Arkansas State Missions Notes.

BROTHER BRATCHER has taken the work at Mena. They have probably finished the parsonage by this time. Hope this arrangment will prove satisfactory and beneficial all around. Individual consecration and united effort constitute the elements of success.

HATFIELD will probably build right away. Much good can be done there. Bro. Allhands is having increased interest at Arkadelphia. They have erected a tower and belfry and put beautiful new carpet on the floor. You see all around the touch of the ladies' hands and the influence of a consecrated preacher. Bro. Allhands has also taken hold of the mission work of the southwest district, dividing his time between Arkadelphia and the district. There are few if any more patient and consecrated workers than Bro. A. If we were as as safe in saying all hands are at work as we are in saying Allhands is at work, we would have prosperous churches.

BROTHER CLARK is preaching at Okolona and Gurden. Good will follow his work. He could be obtained, by any good church who will co-operate with him in building them up, for one or two Sundays in the month.

BROTHER KINCAID reports for November from Hot Springs as follows: Sermons, 17; additions, 3; pastoral calls, 125; house roofed at an expense of $45; money raised on salary, $24.50. Brethren, it pays to help such work as these brethren are doing. There are many other equally inviting fields where a little help would tell wonderfully for the cause.

BROTHER CRUTCHER will hold a meeting at Paris the beginning of the year 1900. Hope to learn of good results.

BROTHER DONHAM reports favorable outlook from his district.

BROTHER STRICKLAND, from Pope County, is doing work that is commendable, and he deserves assistance. One commendable feature in the work referred to above is that every one of the churches receiving mission help is helping others. The writer neglected to note the additions reported by the brethren mentioned above. They number 17; eight by baptism, including those in his own preaching.

J. H. JONES, of Amity, evangelist for the Caddo Gap district, writes that the new house at that place is nearing completion. They undertook to raise an old house in order to repair it, when fortunately, perhaps, it fell down instead of up, and they had to repair it with a new one. Brother Jones thinks they now have one of the best in town.

BROTHER W. O. BREEDEN, of Lamar, Mo., preached several discourses at Camden and Fordyce recently. His efforts were well received.

If all who have pledged or ought to pledge for state missions would send the money to Treasurer Daman Clark, Little Rock, without being called on or written to, it would relieve the treasurer, the corresponding secretary, all the members of the state mission board and the preachers who are relying on us for help, of much embarrassment.

If that Sunday-school collection for home missions has not been taken, it is not too late yet.

May God enable all his servants to realize and do their duty. E. C. BROWNING.

ROSY COLOR.

Produced By Postum Food Coffee.

"When a person rises from each meal with a ringing in the ears and a general sense of nervousness, it is a common habit to charge it to a deranged stomach.

"I found it was caused from drinking coffee, which I never suspected for a long time, but found by leaving off coffee that the disagreeable feelings went away.

"I was brought to think of the subject by getting some Postum Food Coffee and this brought me out of the trouble.

"It is a most appetizing and invigorating beverage and has been of such great benefit to me that I naturally speak of it from time to time as opportunity offers.

"A lady friend complained to me that she had tried Postum, but it did not taste good. In reply to my question she said she guessed she boiled it about ten minutes. I advised her to follow directions and know that she boiled it fifteen or twenty minutes, and she would have something worth talking about. A short time ago I heard one of her children say that they were drinking Postum nowadays, so I judge she succeeded in making it good, which is by no means a difficult task.

"Tom O'Brien, the son of a friend who lives on Bridge St., was formerly a pale lad, but since he has been drinking Postum, has a fine color. There is plenty of evidence that Postum actually does "make red blood," as the famous trademark says." Jno. Chambers, 9 Franklin St., Dayton, O.

Angola —Steuben County with its nine congregations is well organized and holds monthly meetings for prayer and conference. Each congregation has preaching for at least part time. A county evangelist is at work among us. —Bro. J K Hester—and in the co-operation of our churches Sister Bertha Clawson is supported in Japan. 'Tis a joyous fellowship. Bro. Hester's first meeting closed Sunday the 17th with 22 additions and no call on the county fund for expenses. Had it not been for county backing, however, the meeting would not have been undertaken.—C. S. MEDBURY.

TENNESSEE.

Johnson City, Dec. 10.—A. A. Ferguson, pastor of the church at this place, has recently closed an 11 days' meeting with 15 baptisms, nine reclaimed, by letter, etc. The work at this place is prosperous. Six additions by confession and baptism since our recent meeting closed. Large audiences.—A. B. CROUCH.

Chattanooga.—The Walnut Street Church has just closed a meeting of two weeks with 12 additions. It was a deeply spiritual meeting. E. V. Spicer, of Selma, Ala., did the preaching. He is a fine evangelist. I have entered upon my fourth year of service with this church. The outlook is promising.—M. D. CLUBB.

KANSAS.

Neodesha, Dec. 18.—Had four additions yesterday; three confessions, nine in the last three weeks and 27 since I came here seven months ago. I have been retained for next year.—J A. SMITH

Norton, Dec. 13.—Our meeting closed here last Lord's day with three added. Bro. W. S. Lowe, field superintendent of missions, preached for us. The weather hindered in attendance. Bro. Lowe is an able, consecrated and loving exponent of the gospel. The brethren regretted to part with Bro. O. L. Cook, yet we are glad to have a brother that can take up this important and responsible work —U G. MENZIES.

Columbus, Dec. 15.—Six more additions here since last report; four baptisms, one from the Friends and one restored.—M. MCFARLAND.

MISSOURI.

Sedalia.—Have just closed my first meeting as district evangelist for the Sedalia district. The Valley City church was pretty nearly disorganized. Bro. J. J. Stark is preaching once a month, and had held a short meeting just before my two weeks' meeting. The results were 19 additions, all adults but one, and eight during Bro Stark's meeting, making 27 in all; 18 baptisms. A good Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor Society were organized. The membership of the church is 91 Address me at Sedalia, box 143.—JOHN LOGAN.

Marceline, Dec 18.—Our meeting closed Dec 14 with 41 additions. Bro. Alfred Munyon did some efficient work for the church. Two made the good confession at regular service Sunday evening.—ISOM ROBERTS.

Blue Ridge.—At my last meeting at Blue Ridge in November four were added to the church; three by baptism We have a faithful few at Blue Ridge.—W. H. HOOK.

Maysville, Dec 14.—Meeting at California closed with 22 added: two additions last night. I shall never forget the kindness of Bro. C. C. Hill and his people.—C. E. MILLARD.

Kirksville, Dec. 20.—Six additions here last Sunday —H A NORTHCUTT.

Shelbina, Dec. 19.—Since last report have had the following additions: Fairview, Shelby County, six; Lentner, six; Shelbina, four; Shelbyville, five; Palmyra, Marion County, nine. At Palmyra I helped L. J. Marshall in a meeting. Bro. Marshall is doing a grand work there.—J. H. WOOD.

ILLINOIS.

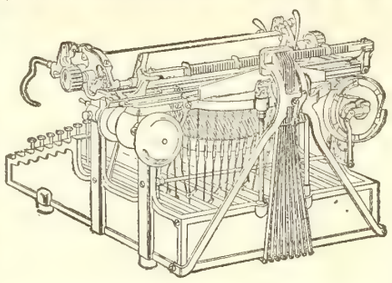
Selmaville, Dec. 15.—Meeting one week old; three baptized. Interest good. Continue over Lord's day.—HATTRESS H. SHICK.

Watseka, Dec. 18 —A young man responded to the gospel invitation last evening, and in the presence of a large congregation owned Christ as Lord and Master.—B. S. FERRALL.

Mt Pulaski —Closed three weeks' meeting last night at Cornland, with 14 added; nine baptisms.—C. B. DABNEY.

Gillespie, Dec. 20.—I am in this mining town with a mission church in a meeting, assisted by John G. M. Luttenberger, of Dorchester. A good interest is being created, but the field is quite difficult.—JAMES W. ZACHARY.

Du Quoin, Dec. 18.—Eight added here yesterday, two more recently, and am preaching to very large audiences. We have engaged J. V. Coombs for a month's meeting, beginning Jan 20 —W. H. KERN.



Saunemin, Dec. 18.—S. S. Lappin, state evangelist, closed a three weeks' meeting here last night. Owing to bad weather and sickness in the community the attendance was not as good as it should have been. And while there were no additions, the church was strengthened and edified.—W. P. CARRITHERS.

Atwood, Dec. 18 —Closed 18 days' meeting here last night with 14 additions. House packed. Interest good to the close. I will hold one missionary meeting during 1900.—A. H. HARRELL.

Griggsville, Dec. 16.—Closed meeting at Laomi last Sunday night with 10 confessions; eight the last day, six the last night. This is where I preach one-half time. The work is in fine shape now.—J. E. DEIHL.

Quincy.—During a part of October and November I held a meeting with the church in Quincy that resulted in 25 additions.—L. H. STINE.

Lyonville, Dec. 17 —The meeting here of three weeks resulted in 15 baptisms, one reclaimed and one by letter. W. E Spicer, who did the preaching, is a fine pastor and evangelist. This is a missionary church. Last year it gave $52 20 to Home and $57 70 to Foreign Missions. Also $17 25 to Christian Orphans' Home, $10.75 to Church Extension and offered two weeks of pastor's time to state work. Nearly every family takes one or more of our religious papers.—D. F. SEYSTER, pastor.

HORACE E. HAND.

Years ago, by parents guarded,
Once a precious Baby lay
In a manger, unattended
By earth's splendor or display.

Friends were few, no gladsome greeting
Welcomed Him, no joyful cheer
Raised a note of praise, no meeting
Of kind friends from far or near.

Was this Babe all unattended?
Listen! Words come from on high,
"Peace to all! let strifes be ended!"
This must be an angel's cry.

"Evermore let good will linger
'Mongst all men! 'tis God's desire!"
Lo! He paints, as with a finger,
Midnight's stars and noonday's fire.

This small Babe, so poor and lowly,
Came from Heaven's eternal thrones;
Laid aside His life so holy,
Changed Heaven's bliss for earthly moans.

To this Babe, with homage loyal,
Seers and shepherds lowly bend,
Guided by the star; no royal
Visitors the place attend.

Yet, that band of humble strangers
Recognized in Him the one
Who, despite all of earth's dangers,
Should all sorrows overcome.

'T was a King to whom they tender
Gifts from out their precious store;
Of their best to him they render;
Surely, man can do no more.

Jesus 't was lay in that stable,
Came to save men from their sin;
He is willing, He is able;
Loving Him we all may win.

Babe no longer, now ascended
Up to Heaven, He reigns above;
We may join Him, if defended
From earth's conflicts by His love.

The Lost Emigrants.

BY R. H. JOHNSON.

CHAPTER V.

On the second morning a party was sent out to explore the island. Two were to go south, two north, two to ascend the mountain. The reports summarized were that the southern part of the island was broken and mountainous; the northern part was gently undulating; the summit of Castle Rock, as we called the mountain from our first impressions of it as seen from the sea, was difficult to scale; its singular castellated appearance was due to its formation of basaltic columns, similar to the Giants' Causeway in Northern Ireland, with which Mr. McGregor, one of the two who ascended the mountain, was familiar.

Prof. Fergus reported that the northern part of the island was well wooded, chiefly eucalyptus, accacia, pine and the kaurus, conspicious for its smooth column and trunk; that he saw ferns and lichens of gigantic size, more like trees than grasses. Better than all, he had found the tree known to scientists as areca sapida, whose young leaves could be used as food, and when full grown made excellent roofing. Also he had found a species of tenax with leaves longer than a fishing-rod and with a fibre superior to flax.

Another gratifying report was that the island abounded in hogs and goats running wild: the goats lacking only the discarded tin can of having a complete menu; and the pigs flourishing on fern roots, nuts and various vegetable products, and varying their diet by a liberal use of oysters and cockles.

The presence of the above animals, together with the ruins of a hut, were accepted as conclusive proof that the island had formerly been occupied by a shipwrecked crew. I should add that the extreme length of the island was judged to be about eight miles, and its greatest width not over three.

The day following the exploration of the Island being Sunday, all work was suspended and the passengers generally were put ashore.

It was a lovely morning with serene skies and the island clad in living green, with its castellated mountain rising a lone sentry over a lonlier sea, was a vision of beauty to our eyes, so long wearied with "old ocean's gray and melancholy waste." Here in a shady nook the captain called us together and made the following speech as I remember it:

"Shipmates and companions in misfortune, the Good Luck is in bad luck. She's made her last cruise. Her bottom's getting more like a sieve every day. She can't sink because she is on a bar, and she's not likely to be got off except in pieces. If we can get her timbers rafted ashore before a storm makes kindling wood of them, which I very much doubt, it will take months to build another boat out of her. We've cast anchor and we're ashore for sometime, I reckon. And I guess the solid foundation we're standing on feels mighty good to all of you, who for months have had nothing but a pitching, tossing plank between your feet and the bottom of the sea. Let us all be thankful that we're here and not food for the fishes.

"Where are we? We're in south latitude 38 and west longitude 108, according to my reckoning, hundreds of miles from any coast or island on the chart. We're a long way from our fellowman, but not from God. He may be very near to us here. Let us not forget him and turn heathen!"

Simon Gray then with great solemnity read from the 107th psalm: "They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters, these see the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep. For he commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifted up the stormy waves thereon. They mount up to the depths, their soul is melted because of trouble.

"They reel to and fro and stagger like a drunken man and are at their wit's end. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble and, he bringeth them out of their distresses. He makes the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then are they glad because they be quiet; so he bringeth them unto their desired haven."

So vividly did the reading recall our experience of the perils of the deep and of providential deliverance that at the conclusion many an eye was bedimmed by tears. Then followed a fervent prayer by Professor Fergus, and then was sung that song of aspiration that belts the world and lifts countless souls on the wings of faith to God:

"Nearer my God to thee." More earnest talks and songs and prayers followed and the meeting broke up, not, however, without a hearty determination expressed to be faithful in our worship, and to reconcile all differences if possible, and to become truly of "one fold and one shepherd."

After a substantial luncheon in which were conspicuous fruits and nuts, we wandered about among strange sights and the unfamiliar vegetation of our new-found home. There was a large stream of sparkling water that fell in many a cascade from a high bluff into the head of the cove upon which we had made our landing.

Having made our way to the top of the bluff, which was perhaps a hundred feet high, we found a broad plateau through which the stream wound. Following the brook up for a mile to the west we found that it was formed by the confluence of two streams, the smaller coming from the northern part of the island and the larger supplied by springs about the mountain.

It was a delightful experience to the weary mariners, storm-driven for many weeks, to feel the tender grass beneath the feet and to look once more on scenes of sylvan beauty, and our lonely hearts took comfort and we were thankful.

The following days were full of activity. Every hour's delay in unloading the ship's cargo increased the danger of its destruction by a storm. A great variety of farming implements and household goods and seeds, now invaluable to us, was being carried ashore.

Then there were coops of chickens and turkeys, that were to be the foundation of our poultry supplies, to go to the island with the rapidly shrinking store of provisions. Then the ship must come ashore in pieces if we were to build another.

Day by day the work went on from early morning to nightfall. The most valuable articles were already ashore, even doors and hatches and bulwarks and cordage were rafted to the beach or piled on deck for removal. Still the barometer was high and Captain Wolcott's spirit rose with the mercury. "We'll get the Good Luck ashore yet," said he.

"We're in luck to have such weather. We'll soon have an anchor to the windward. To-morrow all the furniture and bunks and bedding must go. We'll all cast anchor on the land to-morrow night, and the ship will soon follow after."

That Little Christmas Tree.

It was a little Christmas tree, with candles all aglow,
And golden balls and silver stars, a bright and shining row
The children danced around it, and clapped their hands with glee;
And not a child was happier than the little Christmas tree.

But next week, stripped of all its gifts and cast into the yard,
It murmured with a little sigh: "Now, surely, this is hard!
To give delight for but that night
And then to be forgot,
Would seem to be for any tree
A most unhappy lot!"

But Ned and Ted and little Fred soon spied it where it lay.
"Hurrah!" they cried, "A mast! a mast!
We'll sail and sail away,
And far across the Arctic Seas
Our gallant ship will go,
To find the seals and polar bears
And jolly Esquimaux."

A plank their ship, a sheet their sail, the happy tree their mast,
These bold explorers northward turned, and sailed away so fast
That soon o'er unknown lands there waved
The banner of the free.
The staff that proudly bore it
Was the little Christmas tree.

What afterward befell it would take me long to tell:
It once became a fairy wood, where elves and dryads dwell;
And once a prancing, coal-black steed,
With a noble knight astride;
And once a dark and gloomy cave
Where bears and lions hide.

But when, one day, there wandered by a ragged, shivering boy,
He saw the little Christmas tree and dragged it home with joy
A merry blaze he kindled,
With its welcome warmth and shine,
And the cold bare room was fragrant
With the odor of the pine.

Paul Mordaunt.

FREMONT WARRINER.

It was Saturday afternoon. Paul Mordaunt was alone in his office. The desks were all cleared up and carefuly dusted. Pens, rulers and all the paraphernalia of a well-appointed office had been carefully and methodically put in their proper positions. Mr. Mordaunt believed in the Saturday half holiday. He had satisfied himself by careful computation that his clerks did more work and rendered better service when they were allowed this little relaxation. Mr. Mordaunt himself was merely waiting for his carriage. He was a hard-working man and used his own half holiday as religiously as he recommended it to his employees. He was especially eager to avail himself of it to-day, because he had made the purchase of a blooded horse with a record, and was anxious to be on the avenue showing his friends what it meant to take his dust.

Paul Mordaunt was a good man in the estimation of the world. This somewhat hackneyed expression, we are aware, may not be very luminous with meaning, still it has a significance that may be understood. Those who knew him spoke of him as "honest," "hard-headed," "long-headed," "a knowing fellow," "up to snuff," etc. It would not be easy for any one imbued with what is somewhat vaguely called the worldly spirit to find about him a point vulnerable to criticism; and yet, it was remarked of him that he had no warm friends. There were those who feared him, some who respected him, but none who loved him. This is not, however, strictly true, for his wife loved him. A man may be hated by all the world, but if his wife loves him there must be a point in his nature from which hope may radiate.

He was a religious man, too. When he came to see the benefits of life insurance he became a policy holder to a large amout. Some people said of him that this set him to thinking about the matter of religion. However this may be, it is certain that he connected himself with a church, paid regularly the amount that a man in his affluent circumstances was expected to pay, and attended services with commendable regularity on Sunday mornings. If he sometimes fell asleep in his pew it must be remembered that he was a man of many cares and his pew was a remarkably comfortable and well-cushioned one. He had no time, however, for prayer-meetings. He was overburdened with the cares of business, he said, and the church was indulgent, as churches sometimes are, and full of sympathy with a member who paid well, and whose time was too valuable to himself to give very much of it to the Lord.

He had likewise a well-selected set of maxims upon which he regulated his life. One was that his business should not be allowed to mix with his religion. He had very positive views on this point. As he expressed it himself most happily to a select party at his own table, when dinner was over and they were enjoying their coffee and cigars: "I hold," he said, "that as experience has shown it to be disastrous to the cause of true religion to be affiliated with the state, so likewise, if we would preserve religion pure and undefiled in our individual lives, it must not be permitted to come into contact with matters that are purely of this present world. Hence," said he, "I believe in the absolute divorcement of business and religion." This was enunciated with much gravity and no one disputed the soundness of his position.

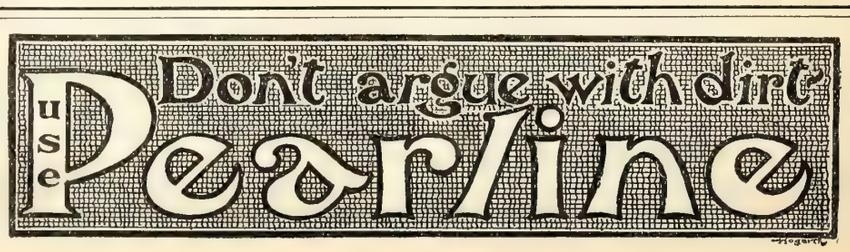
This was Paul Mordaunt, a portly, prosperous, well-groomed man, as they say, just beginning to get a little silver in his carefully trimmed hair and beard, who was waiting alone in his office for his carriage on a certain Saturday afternoon. He was looking impatiently from his window, when the door opened and some one came in. He turned quickly, expecting to see his servant, but it was a stranger, a well-dressed man of thirty or thereabouts, with a look of concern on his face.

"Have I the honor of addressing Mr. Mordaunt?" he asked.

"I am Mr. Mordaunt," was the reply, uttered with evident impatience.

"My name is Somerby," said his visitor; "John Somerby. I am a tenant of yours at 57 North Street. My rent will be due on Tuesday, and I am sorry to say I shall be unable to meet it. I—"

"Mr. Somerby," interrupted Mr. Mordaunt with some acerbity, "this is Saturday afternoon, and we do no business at this time. I will say, however, in order that you may have time to think it over, that it is a rule with us to demand payment promptly when payment is due. We make that an inflexible rule because we cannot do business on any other basis. You will understand we will not depart from it."



Mr. Somerby passed his hand across his forehead and looked very white as he caught the cold glitter of Mr Mordaunt's eyes. Mr. Mordaunt noted his distress, but he had seen such things before and had often said it was a maxim of his not to disturb his own mind with the misfortunes of others that he was not responsible for.

"I would like to say," said Mr. Somerby, "that I have had employment until last month, and I have the promise of work in September, but I am out of funds. I would not care for myself, but I have a wife who is not strong, and we have a boy who is ill and needs our constant care."

Mr. Somerby'g eyes sought the floor, and there was an evident struggle to repress emotion.

"My dear sir," said Mr. Mordaunt, beginning to draw on his gloves, "I have heard hundreds of such stories. I do not dispute your word, but you look as though you knew something about business. If you do, you ought to know that I can pay no attention to such appeals. I would be ruined if I did; and as I got what I have by hard work I cannot afford to lose it in that way. I see my carriage at the door and must be going. I hope, of course, you will see your way clear by Tuesday, but if not you now know clearly what to expect. Good day."

Mr. Somerby went away without another word, and Mr. Mordaunt went downstairs with a vision before his eyes of a white face with despair written across it. It was with him as he went up the avenue behind his new piece of horseflesh, but it left him when he got into a brush with a friend who was a broker, and who had another piece of horseflesh that he thought rather better than anything else on the road. It was an exciting dash and Mr. Mordaunt won. The thought of a white face with despair written across it did not bother him. It did not bother him, either, a little later when he and a few other choice spirits were at a publichouse talking about the race over a bottle of champagne and arranging for another. Mr. Mordaunt was more than pleased with his new horse. Fifteen minutes later he was going back over the same course. The broker was doing better. He kept neck and neck with his rival for half a mile, and then made a terrific burst to gain the lead. Mordaunt spoke a word sharply to his horse, who kept well up and even gained.

From across the road ahead a lumbering watercart crossed the track. Mordaunt did not check his speed, calculating that the road would be clear before reaching the crossing, but the driver of the watercart did not see the racers and stopped before he had cleared the main road. There was no time to slow up, and Mordaunt made a desparate effort to change his course and clear the obstruction, but was too late. A wheel of his wagon struck the rear wheel of the watercart and there was a crash.

A thousand stars wheeled and zigzagged before his eyes for a moment, then a sensation as though a pall as large as the world and black as night settled upon him, and consciousness went out. It was nothing but an inert mass of bruised and bloody flesh and bones that was carefully raised from the ground a few moments latter. And yet he was not dead, nor was he in pain. Something that resembled consciousness came back to him when he was lifted into the ambulance, but it did not appear to him to be Paul Mordaunt. The journey to his home might have been a journey to New Zealand or the Hebrides, it seemed so long. He knew Paul Mordaunt was in the ambulance, but he could not see him, and as for himself he had a curious sensation as though he was running by the side of the wagon, or was on the roof, or riding on the back of the horse. And yet he knew in a sort of confused way that he was Paul Mordaunt, and that he was lying in the ambulance badly hurt. He knew, too, that people were with him and caring for him, though he could not see them. And yet he seemed to see some one sitting at his feet as the wagon rolled on, holding on by a strap as they do in street cars. It might have been the surgeon, but if it were not John Somerby looking at him reproachfully, then Paul Mordaunt was much mistaken. That he might be sure about it he closed his eyes more tightly so that he knew he could not see, and yet there John Somerby sat, and he was holding a sick boy in his arms. This was unpleasant, though he knew there was no John Somerby there. He thought about it until the wagon had gone to the Herbrides by way of New Zealand and then stopped. Then something was done to him, and again consciousness went out.

After this there was a consultation over his couch. It seemed there had been among other things a concussion that seriously injured his head. The wife of the injured man was distracted when the physician, after a long examination, shook his head and looked serious. The something that resembled consciousmess had returned to Paul Mordaunt. He could even hear the whispering at his bedside. He was still without pain and, half crazy, whimsical ideas came into his mind. "These doctors are fools," he thought. "They fear I am going to die because my head has been hurt, when the fact is, I cannot feel that I have any head. I begin to question whether a head is an essential matter after all." Then in the ceiling he saw again the face of John Somerby with despair written across it. This was unpleasant. "If it were really John Somerby," he thought, "and I could talk to him, I would tell him to pay no rent until September if he would keep away and not trouble me."

After this something was put into his mouth and he fell asleep. How long he slept he could not tell, but he had a sensation that it must have been a year at leat. He speculated on it for a moment and wondered, in case a year had elapsed, what had become of John Somerby and his wife and sick boy. While he was thinking about it he noticed that some one was sitting by him on his bed. Whoever it was he was a stranger, with an expression on his face of indescribable tenderness. Paul Mordaunt regarded him intently and fancied that the expression on his face was that of pity. He tried to speak, and to his surprise found that he could do so with ease. He looked at his visitor a moment and said:

"Who are you?"

"I thought, perhaps, you had already recognized me."

"Perhaps I ought to know you," said Mr. Mordaunt, "but you can see that I have been hurt, and if I have ever known you I have forgotten."

"Well, then," said his visitor, "I will explain what from your experience I thought perhaps you had already learned. The fact is, as you may have learned, all men are dual. Every man has two natures, one inclining him to do good and the other to do evil. Have you not found that when you would do good evil was present with you?"

"Yes," said Mr. Mordaunt, "I have no doubt that what you say is true, but that does not tell me who you are."

Well, then," said his visitor, "I am yourself. That is, I am your own better nature, and my purpose is to appeal to you through the misfortune that has overtaken you."

Paul Mordaunt regarded his visitor for a long time without a word. Thoughts were surging through his mind that he had never entertained before. He knew there was something unreal about it, but his disordered mind conceived that perhaps in some deep sense his experience was a genuine one. Though it were an illusion, he resolved to humor it further.

"If you have anything more to say," he said, "say on."

"Then let me ask," said his visitor, "are you a Christian?"

"Am I a Christian!" exclaimed Mr. Mordaunt. "Am I not a member of the church? Do I not attend its services regularly? Do I not contribute liberally? I would not be pleased to have any one call in question my character as a Christian."

A strange look came over the face of the one who had designated himself as Paul Mordaunt's better nature.

"A Christian," he said, is one who is like Christ and does his will; is not that true?"

"I suppose," said Mr. Mordaunt uneasily, "that you are right aoout that."

"Now," said his companion in an argumentative tone, placing his right index finger across the palm of his left hand, "take the case of the Good Samaritan. Did the priest act like a Christian?"

"He certainly did not."

"How about the Levite?"

"He did not act like a Christian either."

"Well, what would you say about the Samaritan?"

"He was the one who certainly acted toward the wounded man as a Christian should act."

"Had the Samaritan ever known the man he befriended?"

"Probably not, since he belonged to a race whom the one he succored despised."

"But I have often heard you say it was a maxim of yours not to distract your mind with the misfortunes of others that you were not responsible for. On your honor now, how do you think Christ would regard that maxim?"

Paul Mordaunt's better nature was not sorry to see tears in his eyes and on his cheeks.

"There is another question I would like to ask," said his visitor: "Do you think if Christ were here to-day with his disciples that they would stop at a public house and drink champagne together?"

Mr. Mordaunt dropped his eyes and was silent.

"And another thing," pursued his visitor: "If Christ were a capitalist in this city, do you think he would turn John Somerby and his wife and sick boy out into the street, and—"

"My dear sir," said Mr. Mordaunt, with an agonized look, "you have said enough. I am not a Christian. I am a miserable, selfish wretch. But if God will let me live I will try to be what I ought to be. O, if I could only sleep!"

His visitor placed his hand on his forehead and regarded him with a look of ineffable sweetness.

"You will sleep," he said.

And he did sleep. When he awoke he was in his own room. The sun was shining through the curtains. Pains racked his body as he tried to move, but he was himself. His wife was by his side. When she saw he was awake she bent over him.

"Paul," she said, "you are better, but you must not talk. The physician has strictly forbidden it."

"I must ask one thing," he whispered, "What day is this and when was I hurt?"

"This is Sunday," she said, "and you were hurt yesterday."

"I thought it was years ago," he said, and fell asleep.

In the afternoon he was awake and conscious. His wife bent over him.

"Mary," he said, "there is one thing that must be done quickly. I have a tenant, John Somerby, at 57 North Street, who has a wife and sick boy. Send word to him at once that I say he need not pay his rent until he is able. Be sure and tell him I say so. Will you send at once?"

When his wife assured him she would attend to it without delay he looked pleased and was quiet.

Early in the evening she noticed that he appeared restless. She bent over him and gently pressed his forehead with her hand and asked him if he needed anything.

"Mary," he said, "will you please take your pencil and make a memorandom for me?"

In a moment she was ready, pencil in hand.

"I don't know," said he, "how long John Somerby may have been out of work. I think he said it was a month. In any event his family may be in want. Just write down a barrel of flour, a good roast of beef, a ham, a bushel of potatoes, a chicken to make broth for a sick boy and some grapes and other fruit. May be you can think of something else."

His wife bent over him and kissed his forehead. A brighter light than she had noticed since he was brought home came into his eyes.

"Mary," he said, "you are a Christian, a better one than I have ever been. The person who was here last night and told me some things may come again to night. If he does I want to have something to tell him. I want you to see that John Somerby gets these things to night, and I want him to know that they came from me. If this can be done I think I shall sleep and be better."

It was all done as he desired. The person who was there the night before did not visit him that night, for he slept soundly and refreshingly. When he awoke in the morning he was decidedly better, though still weak and unable to move. After his wounds had been dressed and he had been fed a little broth he noticed that an organ grinder was playing in the street below. The music was execrable. His wife asked him if it disturbed him, and said if it did she would have the man move on.

"Mary," he said, "I do not feel delirious, yet I certainly do not feel like myself. If I were to go down on the street I know that organ grinder would move on. He always does when he sees me, because I once drove him away and called him an idler. And yet, I feel that perhaps he is doing what he can best do to make a living. He may have a sick boy, too. I wish, Mary, you would go and give him a dollar and say to him it came from me. I do not like to have him think me a brute."

DORCHESTER, MASS.

A week later Paul Mordaunt was sitting up, though unable to stand. He seemed in every way a changed man. He had become so thoughtful about the comfort of his wife that it seemed to her as though the days of their early acquaintance had returned. He was much occupied, too, with thoughts and plans of doing good to others as soon as he should recover his health and strength. He had caused inquiries to be made regarding Jonh Somerby and had secured him more lucrative employment. He had likewise made inquiries about the sick boy, and on learning that he was getting stronger and that he was begging his father for a box of tools that he might construct a sled, not only sent him a bran-new one, resplendent with red paint, and warranted to possess great speed, but sent him also a new set of tools that quite set him up in business as a young carpenter.

When his wife, who attended to all this, had returned and told him how John Somerby and Mrs. John Somerby and the sick boy had shed tears and called him, Paul Mordaunt, the best man in the world, whom they would always respect and love, he drew her head down upon his breast and kissed her.

"Mary," he said, "that old watercart was Providence. That is to say, God, who had always been knocking at my heart and not finding me at home, took that means of knocking a little sense into my head to teach me that selfishness means misery and unselfishness means happiness. The world is wrong. The true philosophy of life is to seek the good and happiness of others. An opportunity to serve carries with it more joy to the one who gives than the one who receives. There is a kind of selfishness that is holy. There is a field opening up before me, the existence of which I never suspected before. There is a selfishness that leads us nearer to God. It is this that my own better nature, or God, has revealed to me."

"He that showed mercy on me is my brother," said Mary.

"Amen!" said Paul Mordaunt.

Washing Baby's Flannels.

The dear babies' flannels must be washed more carefully than those of adults, as they are usually more delicate and expensive and need gentle treatment. Use water as hot as your hands can confortably b ar, and put the little flannels in a tub separately from others, and wash them through two hot waters, making the suds of Fairy Soap, with a little Gold Dust Washing Powder added to whiten and soften the texture and fiber of the flannel. Rinse in warm water, and pull and stretch each little piece in shape and hang securely on the line out doors to dry. The work mus be done speedily; never let the garments lie a moment longer than necessary.

With The Children.

CONDUCTED BY

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS, PLATTSBURG, MO.

The Red Box Clew—XII.

"Mercy me!" cried Mrs. Clarmont, as she sat on the front porch. "What creatures are those coming up through the pasture? If it isn't Vega and that Fanny! And literally soaked, and dripping at every pore! Vega will take cold! Clara, run and get her something dry to put on. It is all from bringing that city waif here to get my children into trouble."

By this time the two girls had entered the yard, an arm about each other's waist. They ran up to the house.

"What does this mean?" demanded Mrs. Clarmont sharply of Frank. "Explain instantly how you got my darling in such a disreputable and dangerous condition. Clara, take Vega in."

"We got into the brook," said Frank in a hesitating voice, "and—and it wasn't because we wanted to; and—and we got out."

"How came that wound on my darling's forehead?" cried Mrs. Clarmont. "Oh, you wicked little girl, you are to answer for this!"

While Vega could not hear a word, she understood her mother's looks. Clara was trying to drag her away, but she rebelled. "Now, ma," she cried out; "it's all my fault, and don't you be hectoring over Frank." For part of the deaf girl's education had been neglected from infancy, and respect to her mother was one of the neglected branches. "I won't budge a step from here till Frank comes with me. So let her come, or I'll stay out here and catch cold and die on your hands and you can't help it!" This threat so frightened the fond parent that Frank was suffered to go.

"Ma, said Ronald, looking up from his book, "seems to me Vega will take this house before long. She already owns you and Clara and Mrs. Drew."

"Ronald, I insist that you shall not bring in the housekeeper's name when you begin to name over the family. I often grieve over the shocking taste you show in staying so much in her company. My son, she is a menial."

"I suppose she is a human being, also?" inquired the boy innocently.

"I do not know whether she is or not," said Mrs. Clarmont, perversely. That is her affair. But as to Vega, you do her an injustice. She is a noble girl. It is as plain as the nose on your face—"

"Please, ma," he interposed ungraciously, "why do you always pitch upon my nose? This is the third time to-day you have worked it up in your comparisons."

"I was about to say, Ronald," rejoined his mother mildly (Mrs. Clarmont was afraid only of her children), "that it is plain Frank persuaded Vega to go wading in the brook in their clothes; they must have got to wrestling, and I fancy Frank threw Vega down. You see how confused she was about it. But Vega has forgiven her."

"Then she is a very different Vega from the young lady I am acquainted with," said Ronald resuming his book. In the meantime, Vega had dressed Frank in a suit of her own, much to the delight of both, and the annoyance of Clara. During the operation the children giggled so Clara left them in disgust. It seemed to her so common for people to be happy. Of course, she could not understand the cause of their happiness. In Frank's case it sprang from the fact that by returning good for evil she had won Vega's friendship; and Vega was happy because she had thrown aside her sulkiness and had given gratitude a home in her heart. Had they been boys they could have gone forth as usual after dressing. But being girls they had a lot of hair to dry. So they combed it out over their backs and sat on a divan by the open window where the sun could stream over them. And they felt healthy and full of life, and the world smelled like it was full of fun, as its odors swept through the window. Their arms were about each other. And suddenly Vega said:

"Frank, I don't understand you."

Frank smiled at her inquiringly.

"No, not a bit. You are not like other people. When I shoved you into the brook, why didn't you get mad? When I fell in, why didn't you laugh? After I had treated you so, why did you—" But it sounds so strange to talk to each other about kissing, so Vega did not finish the sentence.

Frank wrote, "I knew it would please my Friend."

"You mean me? But I wasn't your friend."

"No, I do not mean you."

"Well," said Vega, "nobody else was there."

"Oh, yes," Frank wrote; "God."

"Oh!" said Vega, staring out of the window. Presently she said, rather fretfully, "You don't suppose he is always paying attention to you, do you? We never think about him here, unless it's Sunday, or a preacher visits us."

"Well," wrote Frank, "he is my best friend, that is why I think about him so much. You see he has done so much for me, and he keeps me so happy all the time, except just at times, but he helps me to forget the dark part."

Vega read this slowly, and then said, "I don't understand any of that. How has he ever helped you? And how does he keep you happy? Isn't he 'way off somewhere in heaven? And nobody knows where that is, except it's ever so much higher than the stars. Whenever I think about God, I think of a something like air or soul, or something 'wa-a-a-ay off a million of miles."

"Do you think," Frank wrote, "that after he had made a beautiful world like this he would stay away from it? God can do everything. Well, when he knows how many thousands and thousands of people down here are loving him and trying to please him, don't you think he will visit us? And how could he ever go away from a heart that had its doors and windows open to him all the time?"

"If he was to come into my heart," said Vega, "he'd find it pretty dark, I expect!"

"Dear Vega, make it bright for him; then he will come and stay with you. And when you are troubled, all you will have to do will be to whisper to him and tell him all about it, and in the morning the trouble will be gone."

"Oh, Frank," said Vega, despondingly, "all my life is a sorrow, every day just another trouble; trouble to me and to others.

How can I make my heart bright? What can I do but live and worry? You don't know, because you never had a real trouble. Suppose you were stone deaf, like me, and so young! How I loved to play on the piano, and to hear others play! And then, the games with the children, and going to school. I made them put the piano up in the attic because the sight of it nearly kills me, now. And here I sit, talking, talking, and never hearing a word I speak! When I see big wagons going by, I try to imagine how they rumble; and in the evening I wonder if the air is full of katydid song and frog trilling, and oh Frank, I am even forgetting how they sound!"

Frank kissed Vega with tears, and at first did not know what to say. But at last a thought occurred to her and she wrote, "It isn't the things you can't do, but the things you can, that make you good and useful and great."

"The things I can do!" Vega echoed. "But I can do nothing. Nothing but mope and annoy people and brood and be a burden. Oh, Frank, show me how to be good and useful and grea ! Is there a way, and can I do it?" For answer Frank got her Bible and showed Vega many passages which she and Brother Wilton had marked. They read them together, and Frank wrote on the slate many things which she remembered hearing her old friend say in explation of passages. And so Vega began to dimly understand that there was a way for her; and that this way led among self-denials, and every mile was marked by the sacrifice of a selfish desire. It was very simple—only to love God with all her heart and her neighbor as herself. Simple in statement, but how difficult in deeds! But would the difficulty not be worth the while? Then the world might even be glad that she lived in it. Frank left her to think over these things, and sought out Mrs. Dew. "Mrs. Dew," she said, timidly, "I have a very serious reason for asking you to tell me about that little girl that was taken from you years ago."

Mrs. Dew dropped her sewing and turned very pale. "My dear," she said in a voice of great pain, "I cannot bear to speak of it It tears my heart. Do not refer to that again, dear. I try to forget it. I am trying to forgive the man that took her from me. When I know I have forgiven him I shall tell him; then you may hear a little of the story."

"But Mrs. Dew—"

A look of anguish on the housekeeper's face stilled Frank's tongue. So for a time her doubts and fears remained.

THE BIRTH OF JESUS.*

INTRODUCTORY.—If the objection sometimes made to the International Series of S S. Lessons, that they fail to give an orderly and consecutive view of divine truth, was ever valid it will surely not be offered against the lessons of the coming year. They will be devoted solely to the life and teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ, and will involve the study of the four Gospels, upon which we are now to spend eighteen months without interruption. This is a rare opportunity for all the followers of the Master to review that matchless character and life which have been the hope of the penitent believer and the despair of the would-be imitator. There ought to be a campaign in all our churches in the interest of Bible study, and an earnest effort to bring the minds and hearts of all Christians to a thoughtful study of the life of their Lord. This is a good time to agitate the question of the presence of the parents in the Sunday-school, and to inaugurate the Home Department of the Bible-school. Let us labor for a revival of Bible study throughout all our congregations. That the writer may be of some slight service in making the person and ministry of our dear Savior more real and vital to some of his fellow workers is his highest ambition and most earnest prayer.

THE LESSON.—The great Augustus Cæsar had succeeded to the throne of his uncle, the immortal Julius, and the world, after an age of ceaseless war, was enjoying a welcome peace. The doors of the temple of Janus were closed for but the third time in Roman history. The empire had spread its mighty arms to embrace the whole world, and the golden milestone in the Forum at Rome became the common center from which all the famous roads of three continents radiated. The wealth and power thus centered in the hands of the Cæsar he would be careful to augument by every means at his command. He determined to take a census of all the peoples under his rule, doubtless for the purpose of imposing a tax, to meet the vast expense of royal government and luxury. The land of Palestine fell within the jurisdiction of the governor of Syria, and the edict reached the people through the authority of Cyrenius, or, as he is called by Tacitus, Quirinius, who seems to have twice occupied this position, the first time at the period of the birth of Christ, and again some ten or twelve years later.

Scattered through the Roman dominions were that strange people who seemed to retain their racial peculiarities with singular tenacity. In Palestine, at least, they kept their pride of blood, and were looking with intensest longing for the coming of the promised Messiah, through whom Israel was to be reinstated in her former glory and power. These Jewish citizens, instead of enrolling themselves in the registers of the various communities where they chanced to be living, chose to return to the districts where their fathers had found their tribal homes. They might thus hope to keep unbroken their family registers, which, to the descendents of David, at least, was a matter of supreme concern. Among those who boasted of royal blood were some whose humble worldly estate was in marked contrast to the glory of their great ancestor. Joseph, a carpenter of Nazareth, a godly son of the tribe of Judah, had sought and won the love of a sweet and modest maiden of the same tribe. But, as he was about to consummate the marriage, to his horror and profound grief he learned that Mary was soon to be a mother. Before he could take the legal steps that should nullify the espousal, however, he is informed by an angel of the Lord of the meaning of the fact which had seemed to him so full of shame for her whom he loved, and of bitter disappointment for himself. What had been thought her reproach was her glory. To her had been given the supreme honor for which every Jewish woman had hardly dared to hope or pray, that of bringing the Messiah into the world. She was still the chaste virgin whom he had trusted and loved, and the crown of motherhood had been placed upon her brow by the hand of Infinite Love. Wondering at the mysterious providence in which he had been made to play so large a part, he accepted gratefully the sacred trust committed to him, and took Mary as his wife according to the law of Moses. But the revelation of the divine purpose had so wrought upon his nature as to make it impossible for him to look upon his young bride without the deepest reverence, and the sacred narrative informs us that until after the birth of Jesus Mary remained "wedded maid and virgin wife."

Finding it necessary to go to the city of his father David for enrollment, and unwilling to leave behind him his tender companion, Joseph makes his way by slow stages to Bethlehem, a distance of eighty miles. Arriving probably in the evening, they find that the one "inn," or "khan," of Bethlehem is already filled to overflowing, and must needs accommodate themselves in the rude enclosure kept for the beasts of burden. Here, without the comforts of home, or the tender ministry of other hands than those of the devoted husband, the maiden mother bears the holy child, and the King of Glory finds his first earthly throne in his mother's arms, his first rest in a manger. How often in the sad years of his later life must Jesus have remembered the story of this lowly shelter, the only one offered him in the city of David, though he was David's Lord, and found in this fact a fit prophecy of the cold welcome given him in the hearts of his own people, though he came to be their Savior. Little dreamed the nobles of Bethlehem that night that the greatest event of all time was transpiring in their midst. If tidings came to them in the morning that a child had been born in the stable of the "khan," the report would be dismissed with brief remark, or perhaps a single word of sympathy for the parents. "We never know where a great beginning may be happening. Every arrival of a new soul in the world is a mystery and a shut casket of possibilities." But all Judæa sleeps on, and wakes but to busy itself again with its petty cares, not knowing that the ages have at last come to their predestined summit, and that the world will henceforth have the wider and further vision for which the prophets had longed and prayed.

Does all Judæa sleep? No, not all. Upon one of the spots of pasture land that lie around Bethlehem, amid the chill dews of the winter night, a few simple shepherds were watching their flocks, perhaps guarding them from the wild animals with which David himself had contended in the days of his sturdy youth. It was not far, probably, from the fields in which "Ruth, the Savior's ancestress, had gleaned, sick at heart, amid the alien corn." Were they talking together of the hope of their nation, so long deferred; and questioning when the Lord would realize the expectation of his people and send the Messiah? Were they pouring out their souls in some of the psalms of David, and thus voicing the heart of their suffering race? It may be. In any event, these simple men were evidently in a more ready frame of mind to receive the tidings of the Savior's coming; and the angels from heaven pass by the haughty and self righteous scribes and Pharisees to bring these humble sons of toil, these untutored, believing peasants, the message of abounding joy.

Heaven could not keep silence in the hour of earth's good fortune. If there is joy among the angels when one sinner repents, what must have been the ecstasy in heaven when the Son of God came to man's assistance, and the redemption of the human race became a certainty. The darkness is suddenly swallowed up in a great light, and the oppressive silence is broken by a voice of supernal sweetness, saying, "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all the people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord." And, like the waters which have been pent up long behind the barrier, at last to break forth and rush down to refresh the plain, the song which the heavenly host have not before been permitted to sing is now given freest utterance, and they make the welkin ring with the high refrain:

"Glory to God in the highest,
And on earth peace, good will toward men."

The Prince of Peace has at last come, and of the increase of his government and of peace there shall be no end. From the rising to the setting of the sun this refrain shall echo and re-echo until the whole earth shall be filled with his glory, and man shall learn to love and serve his fellowman. Directed to look for the divine child in his lowly stable-home, the shepherds hasten to verify the heavenly vision, and tell for many days after of the experiences of that night. Perhaps their story makes little impression upon the stolid hearts around them, for we read of no marked results that followed. But that night shall be forever the parting of the paths of time For its sublime drama all history before was but a preparation, as all succeeding history shall feel its mighty impulse. The Savior has come and the salvation of man draweth nigh.

"Joy to the world, the Lord is come!
Let earth receive her king;
Let every heart prepare him room,
And heaven and nature sing!"

Ion Keith-Falconer.

BY W. J. LHAMON, Director.

This noble young man has been called a modern apostle. He was the son of Earl of Kintore, and his noble ancestry runs back to Robert Keith, who in the early years of the 11th century became one of Marischals of Scotland by reason of his valor in battle. In 1856 Keith-Falconer was born, and at seven years of age he went among the cottages reading the Bible and trying to explain it to the peasants. As a young man he stood first among his fellows in athletics and as one of the earliest of bicyclists he determined upon nothing short of the championship of England. In In 1882 he was the first to make the run from Land's End to John O'Groat's house, a distance of not far from a thousand miles.

In college he was a hard and earnest student, and while he won positions of honor, and first prizes, he engaged in active evangelistic work among the lower classes of the college town, telling them the gospel story in a frank and simple and brotherly way. He put great stress on personal work, of "having a talk with a man," as he called it. In 1880 he gave 2,000 pounds to help build the great Assembly Hall, "which now towers upon Mile End Road in London, England, where 5,000 people may gather under the sound of one voice, where a people's service is held every night, while the playhouses and grogshops have declined in value since the hall was built, and where one of the worst regions in modern city life is being redeemed." Besides this handsome gift he engaged actively in a canvass for further funds with which to prosecute the work.

During his college days he had taken great interest in the study of the Bible and its original languages. From Hebrew he was led to Semitic and from Semitic to Arabic. He came at last to a point where if he followed up his Oriental studies he had every promise of becoming the "greatest living Orientalist." On the other hand, he had the opportunity of opening up a mission among the Mohammedans, and of bringing the light of life to benighted Arabia. He chose the latter. On the one hand, he bade adieu "to science, fame and comfort," while he chose, on the other, the seclusion and discomfort of a pioneer missionary among wretched people and in a threatening climate.

The city of Aden lies in Arabia at the point where the Red Sea opens into the Indian Ocean, in a part of the peninsula described as "a barren, comfortless wilderness of sand and rock twelve degrees from the equator." But Aden is a highway of travel and commerce between Arabia and Africa, as many as a quarter of a million of camels coming into it each year and many slaves passing through it from Africa into the interior of Arabia and the adjacent countries. He saw that the multitudes of human creatures living there and coming and going had no physician for their bodies, much less for their souls. He procured a Christian physician, and himself studied medicine, so that by administering to bodily wants he might find access to needy souls. The mission was begun in 1886 and in the short space of five months Keith Falconer's work in it was done. This rare soul was called from his earthly work to his heavenly home. Strangely enough, it is affirmed that few who came in contact with him during that brief time would afterward confess that they were Mohammedans.

He was a representative of that class, all too small, of the "cultured, the wealthy and the unselfish," and to these, as to all, he made his appeal for Christ's cause in the following words: "While vast continents are shrouded in almost utter darkness, and hundreds of millions suffer the horrors of heathenism or Islam, the burden of proof lies upon you to show that the circumstances in which God has placed you were meant by him to keep you out of the foreign mission field."

Rev. W. J. Mutch, to whom we are indebted for the substance of this very brief sketch, says that great as he was in life, like Sampson, he was greater in death. His example called out others who devoted themselves to the foreign field, and when the church sent forth a call for volunteers to fill the breach made by his death thirteen young men responded.

The mission founded by this "flower of English civilization" lives and leavens both the English soldiery stationed at Aden and the various tribes of Arabs, Jews and Pharisees who are met there. He died at 30, and "his works do follow him." The length of his life is far greater than the sum of his years, and the ardor of his faith should be a rich heritage to a great host of young men, whose choicest gifts are none too rich for the service, or if He wills it, the graves of our God and his Christ.

Free—A Wonder Shrub—Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc

New evidence shows that Alkavis, the new botanical product of the Kava-Kava Shrub, is indeed a true specific cure for the diseases by Uric Acid in the blood, or by disorders of the Kidneys and urinary organs. A remarkable case is that of Rev. A. C. Darling, of North Constantia, N. Y., as told in the New York World of recent date. He was cured by Alkavis, after, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine, and was preparing to die. Similar testimony of extraordinary cures of Kidney and bladder diseases of long standing comes from many other sufferers, and 1,200 hospital cures have been recorded in 30 days. Up to this time the Church Kidney Cure Co., No. 400 Fourth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of Alkavis, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all Sufferers to send their names and addresses to the company and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative powers it is sent to you entirely free.

Literature.

RIGHT LIVING AS A FINE ART. By Newell Dwight Hillis, and published by Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, Chicago and Toronto; 52 pages, board cover, price, 30 cents.

This sweetly written and highly tuned little volume is a study of Channing's Symphony as an outline of the ideal life and character, and abounds in wise and elegant phrases and periods. In the hands of a young person it ought to be an inspiration and a comfort. In the light of its sayings it is evident than many, far too many, people are trying to realize an erroneous and false idea of life. This is one of the books whose value is to be measured by its sayings rather than its size.

THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY, 1900, by W. W. Dowling. This is a handsome volume of nearly 400 pages. It is well printed and well bound. It contains charts, maps, illustrations and a dictionary of scriptural names with their pronunciation and meanings. The thoughtful teacher or pupil will find in this work all the help that he can profitably use. In addition to the text the author gives readings for every day in the week. The commentary on each lesson is divided as follows: Preliminary, Expository, Illustrative, Applicatory, Practical, Suggestive, Teaching, Review. There are diagrams connected with each lesson for the blackboard. It would be difficult to add to the comments so full and so complete are they. The hand of the veteran author has lost none of its cunning. This volume is one of peculiar interest and value inasmuch as the lessons for the entire year relate to the life and teachings and work of Christ.

THE HYMNAL. A collection of hymns and sacred songs, edited by the Rev. Louis F. Benson, D. D., and William W. Gilchrist, Mus. Doc., under the direction and authority of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States.

This is a volume of some 600 pages, containing over seven hundred hymns, chants, canticles, etc., and a number of selections for responsive reading. Mechanically, it is a thing of beauty; type, paper, make-up and binding are beyond criticism. The work of editing and compiling covered, we believe, a period of several years. The result is a hymnal of which Presbyterians may well be proud. The music is of a dignity suited to the worship of God, and we rejoice to note the entire absence of paraphrases of music hall and vaudeville ditties. Some of the collections issued by our own houses have not been thus expurgated, we regret to say. "The Hymnal" will doubtless remain the standard among Presbyterians for a generation to come. The book is issued by the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia.

THE TRUE ESTIMATE OF LIFE AND HOW TO LIVE. Addresses delivered at Northfield, by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago and New York.

This book consists of a series of nine addresses on leading religious themes, the first of which, "Paul's Estimate of Life," gives the title to the book. Mr. Morgan's style is very earnest and direct, and the addresses are of the evangelistic type, intended to carry conviction to the heart to the hearer or reader. Many of his illustrations are very apt, and while his interpretations of Scripture are not always above criticism, there is a moral wholesomeness about the addresses that will commend them to general acceptance. The following extract from his address on "Gathering or Scattering" may seem a little hard to many parents to day, but it gives the preacher's estimate of the influence which a Christian man should have over his own family. Referring to some home where he had visited, where the father had no time to look after the children and where the usual consequences ensued, Mr. Morgan says: "A man who cannot hold his family together for Christ by the attractive power of Christ in his own life, isn't wanted in the church; let him keep out. That man cannot do anything for God in public places if his own home is devastated and broken up by the principle of rebellion against God. And if the influence a man is exerting on his own family is an influence that scatters, that man is not with Christ. If you are with Christ, hold your bairns for him, and your family will be God's first circle of the kingdom, as it always has been, and it will be a witness to the power of Christ in you and through you to gather men together" (p. 109).

A HISTORY OF NEW TESTAMENT TIMES IN PALESTINE. By Shailer Mathews, A. M., and published by the Macmillan Co., New York; 218 pages, cloth.

The fact that Jesus is to be studied for the next eighteen months in the Sunday-schools generally and by others in particular gives to books of this character a special interest. More and more are we learning to study historic persons in the light of the times in which they lived, and Jesus will become less and less an exception to this rule. This book, therefore, comes forth in response to a demand and will be duly appreciated. While it does not go into the affairs of the common people very far, dealing more particularly with the leaders in the political and religious controversies and parties of the Jews, Syrians and Romans, it is sufficiently elaborate to help one to an estimate of the men and issues that filled the latter centuries of the Jewish nation with so many reversals, upheavals, revolutions and sorrows. Another feature that will be appreciated by many is the relation of many of the historic leaders of the political and religious parties of the Jews to one another and to their people and the times in which they lived. The mention of some of these names in history is not a little perplexing to the ordinary reader, as also the issues over which they quarreled, fought and died. On reading this book one is impressed with the fact that not many of the prevailing political and religious conditions of the Jews in the days of Jesus were very ancient. Beyond a few religious customs, the commandments and principles of their law had been covered with the doctrines and commandments of men. It is for such reasons as these that we need to study in a special sense the times of the New Testament, and Prof. Mathews has rendered a good service in the presentation of this book to the public. This book, by the way, is one of a series of books on the New Testament issuing from the intellectual mint of the University of Chicago.

Winter in the South.

The season approaches when one's thoughts turn toward a place where the inconveniences of a Northern winter may be escaped No section of this country offers such ideal spots as the Gulf Coast on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad between Mobile and New Orleans. It possesses a mild climate, pure air, even temperature and facilities for hunting and fishing enjoyed by no other section. Accommodations for visitors are first-class, and can be secured at moderate prices. The L. & N. R. R. is the only line by which it can be reached in through cars from Northern cities. Through cars schedules to all points in Florida by this line are also perfect. Write for folders, etc., to GEO. B. HORNER D. P. A. St. Louis Mo.

GREAT BOOKS AS LIFE-TEACHESS. Studies of Character, Real and Ideal By Newell Dwight Hillis, author of "The Investment of Influence," "Man's Value to Society," etc. Chicago, New York, Toronto. Fleming H. Revell Co., 1899.

Some one has said that the next best thing to writing a passage is to quote it. Perhaps the next best thing to writing a great book is to interpret it so that the multitudes may understand its moral teaching, even though they may never have had the opportunity to read the original work. Mr. Hillis in this volume has demonstrated his ability to condense the essential facts of a volume into a short story and to sieze the main points and draw the lesson from them. The books studied in this series are John Ruskin's "Seven Lamps of Architecture," George Eliot's Tito in "Romola," Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter," Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables," Tennyson's "Idyls of the King," Browning's "Saul," Memoirs of Henry Drummond and studies in the lives of Lord Shaftesbury, Frances Willard, David Livingstone and Wm. E. Gladstone.

These are great themes, and they are treated in a most inspiring way. The author blends the qualities of a literary artist with those of a religious prophet, who has the ability, not only to see splendid visions of life and duty, but to make others see them. As a specimen of the author's style we give a few extracts below. Referring to the cry of the pessimist, that all the great days and the creative geniuses are in the past, the author says:

But God is a seed, not a dying leaf. God is a rosy dawn not a falling star. God is a flaming sun, not the astronomy that describes it. God is a living voice, not the creed that explains him. God is flaming, eternal truth, not the manuscripts in which some sage once wrote. His outpoured Spirit that began as a trickling stream is become a river deep enough to swim in.

In a world like ours it ought not to seem strange that God hath kept his best wine of civilization until the last of the feast. Everything in nature and history proclaims this as his working piinciple. . .

Since God hath pledged to society new leaders for new emergencies, what are the signs of their coming? What go we out to see? If we ask history to instruct us, we shall see that every prophet fortelling new times has had three characteristics. He is a seer and sees clearly. He is a great heart and feels deeply. He is a hero and dares valiantly. But vision-power is the first and last gift. That vision and outlook God has given to every Moses and Elijah, to every John and Paul, and with instant skill they have laid the finger upon the diseased spot in the social life.

SEEKING THE OLD PATHS, and other sermons, by Robert Moffett. Published by the author, Cleveland, O. Besides a fine portrait of the author, an introduction by Pres. E. V. Zollars and a biographical sketch by John R. Gaff, this volume contains sermons on the following topics: Seeking the Old Paths; The Revealed Mystery; What Think Ye of the Christ; The Work and Witness of the Spirit; Prayer and Providence; Redeemed by the Blood of Christ; The Greater Works; The Great Commission; The Gospel of Christ; The Remission of Sins; The Greatest Question; What is Conversion; What Hath God Wrought; A Model Conversion; Saul of Tarsus; Under the Juniper Tree; The Woman at the Well; "So." The author is very widely known, having been for years corresponding secretary of the A. C. M. S., and has long enjoyed the reputation of being an able preacher of the gospel. The volume of sermons will increase his reputation. We could wish for it, most heartily, a wide reading. Address the author.

DORSEY, THE YOUNG INVENTOR (Fords, Howard and Hulbert, New York), is a book for boys. Dorsey Dawson, the hero, is quite a boy, and other boys will enjoy reading the story of the alliterative youth. We can commend the book as healthy in tone and very readable. 297 pp., cloth.

OUR SISTERS IN INDIA (Fleming H. Revell Co., Chiago), is an account of Hindu womanhood by the Rev. E. Sparrow, since 1848 a missionary in India. It is a volume of 251 pages, with numerous illustrations and appears to be a complete hand book onHindu femininity. It will be a valuable addition to every missionary library. Price, $1.25.

Where to Locate in St. Louis.

Readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST who may be contemplating moving to the city of St. Louis will find it oftentimes to their advantage to secure information regarding locations and business in the city from those who are familiar with the place. If you are a Christian, it is especially important that you do so, as your business interests and your home and religious life are all liable to be seriously affected by an unfortunate location and unfavorable surroundings. None but those who have tried it know how dreadfully lonesome a place a great city is to a family that may settle in its very center if it finds no ties but those of a common humanity to contribute to its social and religious comfort. In our work as city evangelist we are constantly hearing of families who are most unhappily situated because due foresight was not exercised before a location was selected. Now, to avoid this and make certain that from the day of your arrival you will be surrounded with friends and have help valuable to you, even in business matters, I make a few suggestions to you. Note this, that in this city there are to be found churches of Christ in every wholesome and attractive residence portion of the city; that there are nearly 4,000 brethren here, among whom to make your choice of home and friends, of the truest and worthiest kind. Rents are just as cheap next door to these churches as anywhere else in the city. There are several of our brethren who are in the real estate and rental businesss who will show you special favors and point out to you locations most favorable to you. After the location has thus been selected, report the first Lord's day morning at the church, giving to the pastor your name and number, and at once you will find that you will be surrounded by a circle of friends as true and cordial as those you have left behind. If you will follow these suggestions you will invariably find that it will save you many unhappy experiences. Please bear in mind that we state these things wholly in your interest, and with no motive other than that of a friend, whose recompense will be ample when it is known that you are benefited.

Now, all who wish to avail yourselves of such information as we can furnish you, write us at 7310 Michigan Avenue, and we will send list and location of all our city churches, and, if desired, names of our brethren in business who may be of service to you as brethren in Christ.

A. J. MARSHALL,
City Evangelist.

ELLA JAMES HOWETH,

A most amiable and consecrated young woman, was born April 1, 1875, and united with the Christian Church at Kingsville, Mo., sometime in 1888 under the ministry of that excellent man and faithful preacher, Frank Parker, deceased. She at all times tried to follow Christ and do all the good she could till her death, Dec. 5th, 1899. Ella Howeth was in a peculiar sense a good girl As a daughter she was obedient, kind and helpful. To her brother and little sister she was love's own self, and esteemed no sacrifice too great that would contribute to their good. The writer was her pastor for some years, and can speak of his personal knowledge when bearing testimony to her faithfulness to the church in all of its departments She was brought up in the church and knew nothing but to love it and honor it as God's means of saving and blessing mankind. Her pastor was to her next to her father, and her brethren and sisters in the Lord were as her own kindred in the flesh. Truly, she loved them, and to want confidence in her preacher was as a thorn in her very soul. She was a great though a patient sufferer during her last illness, and died in full faith and hope of immortality. To her family I tender sympathy and that consolation born of the Christian's faith in Jesus Christ. While Ella will return to your arms no more in this life, she yet lives, and you can go to meet her in the home everlasting. Be faithful yet a little while and you will meet her again. May our God be to us all an everlasting consolation and our exceeding great reward, is my prayer.

NEWCOMB.

Mrs. Frinda Newcomb was born Jan. 18, 1819, in Shalersville, O., and died in Fairfield, Neb , at the home of her daughter, Mrs W. L. Sheets, Sept 7th, 1899, aged 80 years. She was the wife of Elder T. J. Newcomb, who died in 1888 Her early life was spent in Shalersville, O. From 1840 to 1859 she lived in Freedom, and then in Hiram, O , till 1882, when she moved to Nebraska. She was baptized in early life by Jasper Moss. Was never absent from the church service when it was possible for her to be present She gave liberally of her means to the support of the church and of Christian education In her younger days her home was a refuge for the unfortunate. So we pass one by one, to the silent land—silent to our seeming, who remain, but full of the songs of the redeemed for those who enter the portals of light

QUARLES.

Mrs. S. A. Quarels, or "Grandma Quarels," as she was affectionately called by nearly all of her many friends, entered into rest August 23, 1899, at her home in San Diego, California. On the 19th of the same month she had passed the 88th milestone of her earthly pilgrimage Hers was a beautiful life. It was made so by her unfaltering devotion to her Lord. Her example was a beaconlight on the mountain peak to guide the weary traveler on the high way to the "promised land." Every life that touched hers was made better by the contact. Her faith moved her to daily effort for the Lord; her hope bore her triumphantly where weak souls fainted in the face of difficulties; her love embraced all good that she knew. Her last words were "faith, hope, love." In the next moment her "faith was changed to sight," her hope to "glad fruition" and she was welcomed into the presence of Him whom she loved so well. The world is better by her having lived in it. Nothing but the well-nigh impossible could stand against her determination to do her Christian duty. The writer of this has known her to often walk two miles to church and back on a frozen road that was too rough for a buggy or to ride on horseback, to teach her class in Sunday school and sit at the table of the Lord This was after she was 75 years old. Her pastor, Bro W E. Crabtree, tells me that till within a few weeks of her death, when her strength failed her, she was always at church when the hour for worship came She was blessed with sight to the last and she divided her time of late years, between making beautiful quilts which she sold and gave the proceeds to missions, and the reading of good literature She wrote me in April that she "read the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST every week, every page," and that she had lately reread "Alone With God," by J. H Garrison, also "Filled With the Spirit, by McNeill, and the lives of Duff, Judson and Martyn, and enjoyed them greatly. She has gone to be with the heroes and saints of all ages She is worthy of that distinction. Her many friends in Missouri, where the writer knew her, will say in their hearts a hearty amen to these poor words. (The week following grandma's death her granddaughter, Mrs Emma Leach Smithey, a young woman of fine Christian character, followed her to the better land, leaving a mother, a husband and two little children.) Sister Quarles' life was an eventful one as well as lenghty. She was married while yet a schoolgirl in short dresses, to a widower whose daughter was her playmate She and her stepdaughter played dolls together some years after her marriage. Mr. Quarles sent his child-wife to school with his daughter for some years. Her marriage was the folly of her youth She was left a widow when young, comparatively. Her only child, Mrs Eliza Leach, of San Diego, Cal., survives her In 1811 "she began life where the Atlantic leaves the shores of New Jersey and completed it where the quiet Pacific lazily creeps upon the 'sunset shore.'"

VOGLE.

On Dec. 9, 1899, at Pape, Mo., a most shocking accident occurred, resulting in the death of Zulia Vogle, a little girl, nine years old, only daughter of Bro John E. and Sister Mollie Vogle, of that place. The child had climbed on a load of straw left near the barn, and playfully concealed herself from view Her father, not knowing she was there, threw a pitchfork thereon, one tine penetrating the skull of the child above the right eye. The wound seemed slight at first, but the following day inflammation began and in a few hours ended a scene of terrible suffering, leaving the heart-stricken parents in the most indescribable anguish of heart. Brother and Sister Vogle are most estimable members and workers in the Christian Church at Pape, and had carefully trained their little daughter in her duty to her Savior and his holy cause in the world's redemption, and in this relation she was an active missionary worker, having secured the awards for the past three years from the mission board for liberal giving. The funeral service was conducted by the writer on the 12th inst., attended by a host of sympathizing friends.

Farewell, little Zulia, your short life is done,
Your mission accomplished and victory won.
The home you've vacated of sunshine and love
You've exchanged for a better in regions above,
And though in our anguish it grieves us to sever,
We're cheered with the promise, 'twill not be forever.
This promise, my brother, my sister, we've heard,
And all will enjoy it who trust in His Word.
May God keep you faithful in his chosen band
Till you meet your dear Zulia in the heavenly land.
